Jacob Folk, who resides just across the Maryland line, near Springs, this county, had quite an experience on Wednesday afternoon, while on his way to this this city with a team and wagon. He had eight dressed hogs, some beef and other produce on his wagon, and when he got to a point at the Red bridge the water was so high that he got off the road and into a hole where the Street Railroad company had done some grading, and he was obliged to unhitch his horses to keep them from drowning, and he had to leave the wagon and its contents there until Friday morning before he was able to get it out. The water had fallen enough by that time to allow him to unload the the meat into another wagon, and they then pulled the wagon back into the road. Mr. Folk brought his load on to town that morning and disposed of the same. He considers that he had a pretty narrow escape as it was to get out with his team and himself.—Meyersdale Republican.

EASTER LESSON.

1 Corinthians xv, 12-21, 55-58.

The doctrine of the resurrection of the mortal body is on the face of it one of secondary importance. The doctrine of prime importance is that of the immortality of the soul. The survival of spirit and continuity of life, as an intuitive conception of the universal consciousness, is in the ascendant today. Current thought repudiates materialism. That the spirit of is other than, superior to and independent of his material body, is the joy and creed of the people in and out of the Churches. That the spirit survives dissolution of the body is the correlate to that. That the spirit, maintaining its identity and conscious of it, reasoning and remembering, freighted with all the treasures of its mortal existence sails out into the sea of eternal life, is the first article of faith as it relates to the world beyond.

The problem as to how and when this spirit of man which persists in its existence and survives the incident of death, is to be clothed is relevantly unimportant. The spirit will retain its characteristics and these will in turn dominate any body with which that spirit is ultimately clothed—so that a practical sameness will be preserved and recognition be made possible.

As to the nature of the body with which the spirit is to be clothed, the apostle is suggestive rather than explicit. He say there is one flesh of birds. The very buoyant construction of the bird, its balloon-like bones and quills indicate that its home is to be in aerial regions. There is another kind of flesh of fishes. The very construction of the fish's body, its prow-shaped head, its overlapping scales, its propelling fins and rudder-tail, all mark it for resistence in the fluid world. Still another kind of flesh of beasts. Its ponderous body differentiates it. It needs terra firma. So will be the body with which it will please God to cloth the spirit. It will be one suited to the sphere in which the spirit is to abide—as bird to air, fish to water, and beast to earth—so shall it be in the resurrection. The body will be one adapted. A celestial body, In corruptable, glorious, powerful, spiritual! One like the body with which Christ arose. Certainly one's superlative ambition will be satisfied when he awakes in such a likeness.

REVIEW.

The successive paragraphs are essentially pictorial. It is all a radiant panorama. Any attempt to literalize it spoils the fine spirit of it all. The book has a motive. It is to reveal the personality and power of God; to show the material universe as an expression of his mind and a creation of his will; to make plain to him man's own conconstitution and his relation to God and earth. The form is singularly effective.

Michael Angelo dipped his pencils into the Book of Genesis when he overlaid the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel with its priceless frescoes. Any other cosmogany would have marred that ceiling with incongruous shapes of man's wild fancy or wilder fear. In place of that one sees the ineffable face and form of the Eternal Father bending to his creative activity. Each successive panels matches its respective paragraph.

Whether the story of man's sin be accepted as literal history or a vivid pictorial and poetical description of man's early struggle with evil, is of little practical importance. To all intents results are the same whether man is a "fallen" being or one struggling up through evolution to an ethical and spiritual life.

The story of Cain and Abel is man's first essay at worship; success and failure in it. The vivid picture of the Ark and Flood rivets the most careless eye. Ark spells salvation. Flood spells retribution.

A great face greets one on the the next page of this album of the Bible. Abraham, "Exalted Father." First emigrant impelled by religious motive undertaking a journey for conscience' sake. Over against this benignant countenance appears the face of selfish, luxurious Lot. One goes to oblivion and the other becomes the "father of nations" and "friend of God." Abraham's disinterested and skillful intercession for Sodom is such a display of early altruistic spirit as to cause a pleasant surprise.

The entrance of the guileless Isaac upon this eldest and sweetest of all pastorials makes one of its pleasantest features. Meditative and placid his spiritual life reaches a higher level than that of his father, and his ethical progress is further marked by his strict monogamy.

Next cames the repulsive picture of the unbrotherly conduct of brothers. The stolen blessing follows the birthright bought by a trick and for a song. The deadly wages of sin has no more graphic picture than in this incident. Esau lives to ineffectually lament his dispising of his birthright. Rebekah loses both of her sons at once. Jacob becomes the frightened fugitive, the forty-year exile. The deceit he practiced on another is practiced on him in turn, effecting the dearest relationship of life.

IT MAY HAVE BEEN GENERAL BRADDOCK'S WATCH

An Interesting Historical Curio in the Possession of a Uniontown Jeweler.

The following interesting description and historical sketch is from the Jeweler's Circular, a magazine published in New York, in issue of February 27, 1907, the historical facts being furnished by Mr. James Hadden of Uniontown:

A jeweler of Uniontown, Pa., William Hunt, has in his possession one side of a watch case which is supposed to have been part of a watch that belonged to Major-General Edward Braddock. It will be remembered that in 1755, England sent Major-General Edward Braddock with two regiments of soldiers to America to hold her claim to the great valley lying west of the Allegheny mountains, and that after a long and laborious march, Braddock, with the flower of his army, arrived at the banks of the Monongahela river, about 10 miles above the forks of the Ohio. The French had driven off a small force under the command of Ensign Ward, and had constructed a fort where now is located the thriving city of Pittsburg, which they named Fort Duquesne, and this Braddock expected to enter in triumph on the following day.

On the morning of July 9 the army had just crossed the Monongahela, where the town of Braddock is now situated, when suddenly the French and their Indian allies opened a destructive fire upon the advanced columns of Braddock's army, and the engagement, which, lasted for three hours, raged furiously, more than one-half of the British troops being killed or wounded. Many were killed by their own men. After three hours' fighting Braddock received a bullet which pierced his right arm and entered his lungs. He fell from his horse and was carried from the field, and the remnant of the army fled in dismay.

The dying commander was borne along with the retreating army over the same route which the troops had taken, through what is now the center of Fayette county, and in the evening of the 13th he breathed his last and was buried in what was known as Old-Orchard camp. The grave of the general is now one of the most cherished historical places of Fayette county.

In the year 1880 a laborer in digging a post hole for the construction of a new fence, discovered a shining object at a distance of two and a half feet under the surface, in the neighborhood of a fine spring, and not a great distance from the route of Braddock's retreating army. He brought the article to Uniontown and offered it for sale. To his surprise he learned that it was part of a gold watch case, for which he gladly accepted the offer made to him.

The watch case is a fine specimen of the engraver's skill and illustrates the legend of the "Judgment of Paris." Paris is represented in a sitting posture. With his right hand he is presenting the golden apple to Venus, who stands before him. Beneath his feet are the figures of a dog and a quiver of arrows. Between Paris and Venus is the figure of Cupid. In the rear of Venus are the figures of Hera and Athens, the rivals of Venus. The owl, the helmet, the shield and two peafowls are also representated.

This watch lid was exhibited at the Columbian Exposition at Chicago, in 1893, where it elicited much admiration as a work of art. In one of the folds it bears the name of the engraver, George Michael Moser, renowned as an English enameler. Moser was born in Schafthausen, Switzerland, about 1705, and died in England, Jan. 22, 1783. He excelled in his profession, had a universal knowledge in all branches of painting and sculpture and may truly be said in every sense to have been the father of the present race of artists. He was an original member of the Royal Academy, and for many years keeper of that institution.

As to the proof that this watch lid was at one time the property of the unfortunate British general, the following is adduced: General Braddock, as before stated, received a fatal wound on the field of battle and was borne along with his retreating army. Terror stricken, the wagoners had cut their horses loose and fled, and from fear that the yelling savages were in close pursuit the utmost confusion prevailed, and the whole route of the retreat was strewn with lost and castaway articles and implements of war.

Among the lost articles was doubtless the watch of the wounded general, which dropped from his pocket as he was being carried toward the encampment of Col. Dunbar, on the crest of Laurel Hill. The location in which this watch was found indicates that the watch had been picked up on the route by one of the retreating soldiers, who, believing that in case in was found in his possession he might be shot or severely punished, concluded to hide it near a spring until he returned to recover it, which he never had the opportunity of doing.

When the watch case was found the movement was already corroded, signifying that the timepiece had been subjected to the action of the elements for a long period. As the time this watch must have been hidden there were scarcely any settlers west of the Allegheny Mountains, nor for many years after the defeat of Braddock was there in the whole of this region a settler who would be at all likely to possess such a valuable watch.

Braddock is reputed to have been a reckless spendthrift, and he alone of all the officers and men who traversed this county in those early times would have been the most likely to own and carry so valuable a timepiece. It is therefore argued that it is very probable and almost entirely conclusive that the watch case now in the possession of Mr. Hunt was at one time the property of the British officer, Major-General Edward Braddock.

Mr. Bowser Acts Like a Tramp

Starts Out With a Good Opinion of Fellow Man, but It Is Shattered.

NO CHARITY FOR HIM.

It Was All Because His Wife Turned Abusive Hobo Away From the Door—Scores Her.

[Copyright, 1906, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.]

"I wish you had got home half an hour earlier," said Mrs. Bowser to Mr. Bowser as they sat down to dinner.

"And for what reason?" he asked.

"A big saucy tramp came to the door and asked for money, and because I wouldn't give him any he swore at me. I wish you had been home to throw him out of the yard."

"How did you refuse his request?" asked Mr. Bowser.

"Why, I told him I had no money for idlers."

"You knew that he was an idler, did you?"

"He looked like any tramp, and tramps are idlers, I take it. You are not going to say that I did wrong, are you?"

"I am going to say this, Mrs. Bowser: The chances are that you have hurt the feelings of a worthy man and imbittered him against his fellow men. The man may not have been a tramp. You asked him no questions and cannot therefore say that he was. The chances are ninety in a hundred that he was some poor man out of work."

"HE BUMPED INTO A DEACON OF THE CHURCH."

"He didn't look to me like a workingman," replied Mrs. Bowser.

Bowser Pities Tramp.

"But that's nothing to go by. His wife may be lying ill. He may have a sick child. Some hard hearted landlord may be about to turn him into the street. He saw the house all lighted up and came up the steps with hope in his heart. He probably said to himself that a Christian family lived here and that he was sure of help. When you opened the door and saw the poor man standing there I know just how you looked at him. It was a look that drove all hope from his heart even before you had spoken a word. He knew that he would get a stone instead of bread."

"I simply asked what he wanted."

"Yes, but I know your way of asking. Did you inquire into the situation of affairs? Do you know whether his wife lies at the point of death or not? Can you say that he has not gone home to children who are crying for bread? When the man left here feeling that all the world was against him, he might have gone down to the river and committed suicide. If you have driven him to that, Mrs. Bowser, I don't see how you can ever forgive yourself."

"If you want me to give money to every beggar that comes along then you must furnish it," she retorted rather sharply.

"That's not the question. We know that there are undeserving people soliciting charity, but at the same time there are others that we should be glad to assist. What I complain of is that you did not ascertain whether he was deserving or undeserving."

"Am I to invite the next tramp into the parlor and ask for his story?"

Scolds His Wife.

"No, ma'am. You are to keep right on in your cold blooded way and drive deserving people to suicide. How many you have thus driven I cannot say, but the list must be a long one."

Mrs. Bowser had no more to say, and the meal was finished in silence. As they went up to the sitting room she worked up a smile and said:

"We haven't been to the theater for quite some time. Suppose we go tonight?"

"I happen to have other business on hand tonight," replied Mr. Bowser.

"Going to a club?"

"No. I am going to settle this question of charity. I contend that the man that called here was no tramp. I contend that you ought to have listened to his story. I have got that faith in my fellow men that I believe their hearts and their purses are ever open to alleviate a deserving case."

"Well?"

"And I am going to prove it to you."

"But how can you?"

"Mrs. Bowser, I am going to put on an old overcoat and cap and go forth. I am going to halt several pedestrians and call at several houses. Not one of them will turn me down. Not one of them will say me nay."

"But how silly all that would be! You may run across some one who knows you. If you will let it all go and come along to the theater, I will give the next tramp a quarter and talk to him with tears in my eyes."

Believes In Fellow Man.

Her levity was unfortunate. It only strengthened Mr. Bowser in his determination. He looked at her very seriously for a moment and then said:

"I believe in my fellow man and desire to still further strengthen that belief. I will appeal to the sympathies of ten people, and I will come home to prove to you that at least nine of them opened their hearts in response. All this talk about the world having become selfish and cold hearted is an injustice to it."

If a cyclone had come along and unroofed the house, Mr. Bowser might have been turned from his project, but as nothing of the sort happened he got out an old overcoat and cap and started off. Mrs. Bowser talked to him till the last moment, but there was no stopping him. He took a walk for six or seven blocks, cooking up a tale of woe as he wandered along, and then he turned in at a cheerful looking house and rang the basement bell. It was answered after a couple of minutes by the cook, and she no sooner caught sight of him than she shouted out:

"Nothing here for the likes of you!"

"But my three children are starving," protested Mr. Bowser.

"Then drink less whisky and buy bread for them."

As he got outside the gate Mr. Bowser met a pedestrian. It was a man with his hands in his pockets and a happy whistle on his lips.

"Would you give a poor man 10 cents to buy bread for his starving family?" was asked.

"Come, now, you old soak, but that's too thin," replied the man as he kept up his pace.

"A wife and three children starving in this land of plenty, and I only ask you for a nickel."

"That's all, but you are not going to get it. I don't encourage bums myself. Clear out or I'll give you one on the nose."

Three minutes later Mr. Bowser rang the front door bell of a house and it was answered by a woman. He started to open his mouth to state his case, but she closed it by saying:

"If you are not outside the gate in half a minute I'll call my husband to throw you out!"

He went without having told his story, and at the third house below he rang the front bell again. He heard a man laughing as he came down the hall, and as soon as the door was opened the story started off with:

"Kind sir, I have just got out of the hospital and haven't a cent to my name. Can you spare me enough for a night's lodging? If you can heaven will bless you."

"The blessings of heaven don't come through such old bums as you are!" exclaimed the man as he bristled up. "How dare you come here and ring my bell? By John, but you get off this street or I'll have you walked to the jug in a hurry!"

Mr. Bowser got. He was turning the corner when he bumped into a deacon of the church Mrs. Bowser attends every Sabbath day and he once in awhile. Here seemed a golden opportunity. He began in a quavering voice to tell of his starving family, but had not got half through when the deacon interrupted with:

"I'd see you in the river first, because I know you are an old drunk, but I'll give you a pointer. Go down to Maple street and find No. 37. A man named Bowser lives there, and you can work him for 50 cents if his wife happens to be out."

Ten minutes later Mr. Bowser opened his own front door and walked in. When he had hung up his hat and overcoat, Mrs. Bowser asked:

"Well, you appealed to your fellow men. How much did you bring home?"

"What are you talking about?" he asked, trying to look surprised.

"You went out to tell a pitiful tale and solicit sympathy and assistance. What is the result?"

Mr. Bowser sat down and took off his shoes and put on his slippers. Then he lighted a cigar and took up the evening paper. When he had read for five minutes he said:

"I was over to the drug store to get some patent mustard plasters, but they were just out. If that fellow don't keep his stock up better I shall stop trading with him." M. QUAD.

Reserve Force.

"Willie, you are just as bad as you can be."

"Huh! I guess you don't know how bad I can be."

"My, my! What a power fer good they air in the land!"—Atlanta Constitution.

Wit and Humor Out of the Mouths of Little Ones.

I was dining with some friends of mine whom I had not seen for some time, and the little daughter of my host was seated at my left. During the meal I turned to her and asked her name. She blushed rosily and hung her head upon being addressed by a stranger.

Her papa said, "Can't you tell the gentleman your name?"

"Patience Wallace," the little one made reply.

"And how old are you?" I asked.

"Four years old at 11 p. m."

I have thought of this quaint reply and laughed at it many times since.

Louise was a blue eyed, golden haired child seeing her fourth summer. Her grandpa was a churchman and a Bible reader, so the child had been told who sends the flowers, the sunshine, the rains, etc.—God. As is the custom, during dry weather the grandpa would put the hose on and sprinkle the lawn and even the street, but at this particular time there had been many days of rain.

One morning her mother pushed up the shade of a window in their bedroom and said, "Oh, Louise, the sun is shining, and the day will be fine," whereupon Louise remarked in her slow, serious manner, "Nen Dod won't have his hose out today, mamma."

A few days ago a kindergarten teacher in this city was explaining to a class what it meant to be a "knight." The children listened with close attention while the teacher explained that "the knights must learn to suffer and not complain. They must learn to be tired and keep on working. They must learn to be hungry"— But before she could finish the sentence a four-year-old girl exclaimed contemptuously: "Oh, Miss Edith, I learned that the first day I was born."

Ruth, aged three years, had been presented with a small silver knife and fork, of which she was proud. She used them at the table in such a way, however, as to bring constant reproof. One day when she persistently put the knife in her mouth in spite of her mother's reprimands she was told crossly that the knife would be taken from her and that no one would love her. Like a flash she replied, "If you loved me as I love you, mamma, no knife could cut our love in two."—Chicago Tribune.

JEFFERSONIAN DEMOCRACY.

Jeffersonian principles were never more in the fashion as a Democratic propaganda then they are now. Whatever else goes, Thomas Jefferson abides. The Democracy is split into three sections, each holding distinctly different views concerning policies of the present, but each of these grand divisions claims the sage of Monticello for its very own. In New York city the near Jeffersonian birthday is to be celebrated by each division of the tripartite Democracy according to the varying interpretations of the "immortal principles" which the divided situation has occasioned. It is interesting to note the differing grades of Jeffersonian simplicity as indicated by the "per plate" cost of these several Jeffersonian repasts. The least costly feast represents an expenditure of $3 per plate. Even at such a moderate cost it is fair to assume there may be other fluid than water for the stirring of the Democratic heart. The intermediate dinner is to cost $5 per plate, and the dinner of the Parker-Jeffersonians touches the high mark of $10 for every sitter who drinks to the memory of Thomas Jefferson and his simple ways. It is a most interesting conundrum—If Thomas Jefferson were on earth, which of these simple dinners would draw him?

The $10-a-plate dinner is to be given by the Judge Parker—the "safe and sane"—division of the Democracy. Senator Rayner has been invited to expound Jeffersonian principles as the safe and sane contingent sees them. There seems to be some doubt raised as to whether Mr. Rayner may be the leading orator because of his recent illness. It is certain, however, that William Jennings Bryan will in no event grace the ten-dollar celebration with his presence. Mr. Bryan is to take the middle of the road as to dinners; his "keynote" is to be given out at the five-per-plate feast. The third dinner—the humble $3 affair—is a notification that William Randolph Hearst and his State Independence League have not dissolved nor dropped out or off. The league is staying organized for the next turn in the Democratic game. Delphin M. Delmas, of Thaw trial fame, will attempt to explain Jeffersonian ideals in accord with the vagaries of Hearstism. Every Democrat may choose according to his taste, not only as to viands, but in the elucidation of the immortal principles upon which he is supposed to base his faith. If he doesn't like the Parker brand, there is the Bryan serving; or, if Bryanism has grown a trifle stale or is thought to be overdone, the Hearst rendering of the creed is a refuge.

These three Jeffersonian events are expected, each one of them, to sound a keynote for 1908. It seems inevitable, therefore, that the Democracy will go into the next presidential preliminaries with at least three differing versions of fundamental principles. It is doubtful whether Thomas Jefferson, if he were to be brought back into flesh, could make a fusion of his divided followers.

Don't You Like This Town?

You live here. Your business interests are here. Your home is here.

You are reading a Mail Order Catalogue. That indicates that you are not spending your money in this town. You are spending it with strangers in a big city. That city has no use for this town except to get your money.

This town has use for your money. If spent here, your money will help to build up the town. It will help to build up your own business.

In the long run more of your money will come back to you if you spend it at home than if you send it to Chicago or some other large city. You spend a dollar with Smith, up the street. Smith spends it with Brown, around the corner. Brown is just as likely to spend it with you as with anybody else. Did you ever think of that?

All of us have to spend money. There is an art in spending it where it will do the most good. If spent so that it will circulate around this town and community, it will help this town and community. You belong to this town and community. Therefore it will help you. Isn't that good logic?

Suppose you think it over next time you pick up the Mail Order Catalogue.

THE FIRST DAWN.

Did it ever occurred to you during the restless hour of early morning, the hour between 1.30 and 2.30, the early dawn, that practically every living creature was awake at that time? This is the hour when all animal nature is astir. The shepherds of old referred to this portion of the night. The cowboy of the country could tell of the early or false dawn. The country practioneer of medicine has noted this awakening of animal life as he has pursued his lonely way through the night to a distant sick-room. The wakeful hour of early morning is ushered in by the crowing of the rooster in those sections of the country settled by farmers and villagers; in the forest by the call of the songbirds; on the sheep range by the rousing of the herd and an attempt at grazing; on the cattle trail by the waking of the half-wild steers which wander aimlessly about for a time, then lie down and complete their rest; by the hunter's dog which goes outside the camp to see if all is well; by the horse in his stable, which proceeds to eat the hay before him, and by the cow in her stanchion, which half believes it is nearly milking time.

Although recognized by men who spend a portion or all of the night in the open, as an established fact, this inaudible summons of nature to all animate life is not accounted for in sacred or profane writing. The restless sleeper in city home, hotel, hospital, aboard a steamer, or in a Pullman probably never gave the subject a second thought, yet one can testify to the uneasy manifestation of some unaccountable cause that compels them to awaken at the hour referred to.

What a quiet, restful, holy hour this is to the one truly realizing the fact that the entire world of life is also awake; that some unseen but gentle touch of nature calls all sleepers to life at this early hour and in this manner emphasizes the eternal fact that "nature is supreme."

Does this early awakening of animate life speak of the final resurrection? Is the silent messenger, speeding through the night on the wings of the morning, a messenger of that Watchman waiting for the dawn of the day when even "the sea will give up its dead?" Can we read the face of the heavens, as did the shepherds of old, and learn of a reason for this general awakening of tired bodies and tired minds?

It is an hour for generous thought, for forgiveness, for precious memories, for a stronger belief in the everlasting brotherhood of man, for the strengthening of good resolutions, for the broadening of both mind and soul and for all that tends to make man better and life worth living.

IT IS CAMBLING.

This time last week the country seemed to be on the verge of a grave financial crisis. The tremendous slump in stock prices the day before was ominous of danger and disaster to business generally. That the effect feared did not result is strongly indicative of the general prosperity existing throughout the land. That a shrinkage of three-fourths of a billion of dollars in the leading stocks on the market scarcely created a ripple on the surface of other business interests is eloquent of the confidence felt in the substantial character of legitimate business enterprises generally. This is indicative of another fact, also, and that is that the change in stock values was only apparent, not real, and was due to a cause which should arouse the moral sense of the people to an evil of vast and increasing magnitude and cause unceasing effort to find a means of overcoming it. In plain words the slump was caused by gambling.

But how can that be? some one may ask, when there is probably not a State in the Union in which there is not a law against gambling, with penalties provided for its violation. A fine or jail sentence follows conviction of shooting crap. Games of chance of all kinds are forbidden and punishment may follow indulgence in them. It may be that laws are not ridgidly enforced or are often evaded; but that argues nothing against the moral sense of the people of the States which places them upon their statute books.

There is, however, no law against the gigantic system of gambling which caused the great slump in stock a week ago, and some people may deem the application of such a word to the system as unjust and misleading. There is higher authority, however, than the word of an humble country newspaper for so designating the practice. Courts everywhere have decided that it is gambling and that a debt created in its pursuance cannot be enforced or collected. This may be reguarded as an official designation and it follows, logically, that whoever engages in the business is a gambler—a stock gambler, if you please—but still a gambler.

If then the winning of money at cards, or keeping a house where money is won at cards, is punishable by a fine or imprisonment, should not some legal restriction be placed upon winning money by betting on the prices of stocks? Great operators in this branch of gambling make every effort to control such prices when they have bets at stake and thus render the system doubly demoralizing by affecting the value of the property of legitimate investors and sometimes stripping widows and orphans of needed incomes. The wonder is that some legal method has not been devised to prevent or restrict the practice by punishing those who engage in it.

TO GROVER CLEVELAND.

Note—Mr. Cleveland's seventieth birthday was very generally celebrated.

Ah, there, Grover!
You're getting over
The limit; but say,
The sort of clay
In your make-up is sound.
And you'll be around
For a long time yet;
And the older you get
The firmer you'll stand
In the confidence of the whole land.
There was a time, Grover,
When you weren't in clover,
So to speak, and your side
Didn't point at you with pride.
But say,
You were in the straight way,
And you stood there
For fair;
And you had the sand
In your craw to hand
Out the stuff
That would beat any bluff.
You were not made
To be afraid,
And, by thunder!
The man that didn't stand from under Got What
Was p. d. hot.
You paved the way
For the square deal of today,
And you're getting your share
From everywhere.
Your birthday
Was truly gay.
They whooped it up in every State,
They flew the flag all over,
And everybody, small and great,
Turned out to honor Grover.
The past is past, what was is not,
And now knee-deep in clover,
His seventy years a burden light,
Wades well-contented Grover.

EDUCATIONAL PROGRESS.

A Word of Appreciation for Our Local School Teachers.

To the Editor of The Republican:

It was my pleasure recently to visit the school of our town of Oakland, and I was favorably impressed with the work being done there and with the excellent corps of teachers employed, that I feel somewhat under obligations to give this form of expression to my gratitude to those persons who have made the many radical and and successful changes in the work of our boys and girls in our local schools. I therefore ask you for a little space in your paper that I may express my appreciation, and that those teachers who have labored so valiantly during the last year may know that their services have not been wholly unnoticed.

There is a systen of complete control and discipline about the entire school. Every student seems to know that there is a system and he or she tries to conform thereto. Possibly, the credit for this order is due largely to the principal, Prof. M. K. Turner. He came here from Pennsylvania, highly recommended, and has measured up to all that the citizens of Oakland were led to expect of him. He is certainly the right man in the right place. Furthermore, the teachers are fortunate in having him to teach the Normal for them, for he is undoubted one of the best fitted men that Garrett county could get to instruct our teachers. It is a rare opportunity to the teachers of this section to be under his influence.

However, we would not have the people understand that there is but one teacher in the local school; on the contrary, there are seven others, as well as another, Prof. Loraditch, who devotes his time wholly to teaching Manual Training. Each of these teachers have contributed liberally to the present excellent condition of our school. They have all united in bringing up the grades to a high standard of excellence. Cooperation seems to have been the one aim throughout the past year: cooperation for the best results, and those results seems to have been centered wholly upon the determination to give our boys and girls the best possible.

Prof. F. E. Rathbun, the able vice-principal, is also deserving of a large portion of the credit for the recent advancement of our school. He has given of his best; and coming from one of the best colleges of the State, and being young and ambitious, his part in the great educational advancement in Oakland has been no small portion. Mr. Rathbun and Prof. Turner will certainly provide an excellent team for the Normal; those who attend should receive much inspiration and instruction.

The other teachers also deserve as much recognition of their services. Each of them has been faithful to every duty, and the general air of improvement among the boys and girls, their discipline and their "wide-awakeness," quickly and decisively prove that their labors have not been without their returns. The other teachers are Misses May Hamill, Lizzie B. Leary, Beulah Loughridge, Zadie Browning, Olia Dunham and Virginia Johnson. Everyone of these have done well this year, have had an excellent success, and without their hearty cooperation and patient labors, the recent great advance in our local school would have been wholly impossible.

In talking with a few of the teachers, I found them exceedingly enthusiastic in their work, and filled with plans and ambitions for next year. Let the parents cooperate, let them be liberal in their praise of the improvement and advancement of their children, and soon Oakland will have a school equal to any in the State, in a town corresponding in size to that of ours. My wish is that the Normal may be a great success, and that next year's school may eclipse this one in the advancement of our children.

A PARENT.

It is little use for the local editor to waste his lungs and sprain his spine in trying to boom a town when the citizens all stand around with their hands in their pockets and indifferently wait for something to turn up. If the capitalists or business men do not put their shoulders to the wheel and do a little boosting it is useless for the editor to try and boom things. He can write "boom" articles till he gets bald headed, but if the citizens themselves do not take hold and push, the town will stick in the mud. Of what use is it for the local paper to suggest improvements and new enterprises if the suggestions are never acted upon? One man cannot boom a town. It requires the concert-action of the citizens. When one man shoulders a town and attempts to carry it there are always a lot of cranky kickers ready to jump on top of the load. Unity of action is what knocks.

Relatives and friends of Major F. B. Blue, late postmaster of Grafton, who died by his own hand at his home on Washington street on Tuesday morning, have become convinced that death was due rather to accidental causes than a deliberate intention of the deceased taking his own life. The position in which the body was found, the fact that Mr. Blue had in a chiffonier just alongside his bed, a revolver of large calibre fully loaded, coupled with other facts that have cropped out since the dreadful occurrence, led them to the belief that the deceased on the night of his death had suffered one of the spells with his stomach which were of frequent occurrence of late years, had become unable to sleep and had arose from his bed and as a pastime had continued the cleaning of the rifle gun, which he had commenced some days previously.

Mrs. John T. Browning, whose serious illness was noted in this paper two weeks ago, suffered a relapse yesterday morning when for an hour or two the outcome was uncertain. She rallied, however, after heroic measures for her relief had been employed by her physician and though yet dangerously ill her ultimate recovery is expected by her family.

In St. Paul's M. E. church Sunday morning last Mr. Franklin E. Rathbun, in the absence of the pastor Rev. J. B. Workman, who conducted the quarterly meeting at Deer Park, had charge of the services and made a most excellent address, which was edifying in the highest degree to the large congregation assembled to hear this promising young man.

Dr. M. C. Capt. J. M. Jarboe is preparing to improve his Liberty street property, now occupied by Dr. Robinson and family, by rebuilding a portion of the house and carrying the new part up two stories. When the improvements are completed Capt. Jarboe and family will occupy the property, removing to it from their present residence on Alder street. Dr. Robinson will remove to the George Fulmer house.

A succession of rain and hail storms, accompanied by vivid lightning and repeated booms of thunder, visited Oakland and vicinity on Tuesday. The hail fell for a few minutes at a time with terrific force and the rain came down in considerable quantities. Thus far during the present month electrical storms of more than ordinary severity have visited Oakland and the surrounding country, each successive one occurring on Tuesday and one week intervening between them.

When the sun shines and the streets becomes dusty, you wish it would rain; when it rains and the streets become muddy, you wish the sun would shime. After you are married you wish you was single, and if you get a new dress you wish you had a new hat to match it; if it is a boy you wish it was a girl, and if it is a girl you wish it was a boy—was human nature ever satisfied? Guess not, and glad of it, for then there would be nothing to "kick" about.

Since it became known that license had carried at the municipal election Tuesday at Grafton, those who seek to have the city council grant them license are working on applications and the accompanying petitions, which have to be signed by a number of freeholders of the city, looking to that end. Notice of the application for saloon license has to be given through the newspaper thirty days previous to granting the license. In accordance with the law, the saloons will open May 1st.

Life is too short to be overshadowed by gloom. Let us live bravely and cheerfully, as well as industriously and dutifully. The true heart recognizes the duty of happiness and faces life with a certain courageous gayety that solves many doubts and scatters the clouds of woe and disaster. Let us cultivate the habit of cheerfulness and know that when we quench the innocent joy of a fellow creature by a word or frown we are deliberately destroying a part of the world's most precious treasures.

Miss Margaret Crystal, who has been residing in Baltimore this winter with relatives, was brought to Oakland Tuesday morning suffering with the grip and the results of having her shoulder dislocated which occurred two months ago caused by falling and striking against a partially opened door. Miss Crystal's condition Tuesday was quite alarming, but at present she is somewhat improved. She was accompanied to Oakland by her nephew, Mr. Charles Sweeney, who returned to Baltimore yesterday morning.

Mr. Peter A Chisholm is making preparations to receive from the United States Fish Commission at Washington a consignment of brook trout which he will have placed in Wilson's lake near Oakland and in one or two other bodies of water near town. Mr. Chisholm has been advised by the Commission that the consignment of trout will number eight thousand and that they will measure three inches each. The fish are now one year old and will be able to care for themselves after being placed in the local waters.

We call the attention of the local patrons of our schools and also the attention of teachers throughout the county to the letter contributed to these columns bearing upon the work accomplished by the Oakland school under the efficient superintendence and watchful care of Prof. Morris K. Turner, its principal. This paper through personal observation endorses every word of the communication referred to and desires to indulge in the hope that Prof. Turner will be retained as principal of the Oakland schools indefinitely. The people here heartily endorse him for the painstaking manner in which he has performed his onerous duties.

SPECIAL SERVICES

At St. Mark's Church Still In Progress Will Close Sunday Night.

The series of special meetings which were instituted two weeks ago tonight by the pastor of the church, Rev. E. Manges, are still in progress and claiming the attention of large congregations.

On last Wednesday evening Rev. J. B. Shoup, the Bittinger pastor, delivered a sermon overflowing with beautiful and practical lessons, followed Thursday night with a second sermon of interest.

Friday evening Dr. W. W. Davis, of the Park, delivered a lecture on the life and work of Dr. Martin Luther which was listened to and appreciated by a large audience composed of members of all denominations of town. Many excellent traits of the pioneer of Protestantism were brought to the attention of the congregation by the speaker who showed conclusively that Luther was a man of high ideals and could not be deterred from the undertaking which he espoused.

The meetings this week were addressed by Pastor Manges on Monday and again last night, both sermons being well adapted to the special effort. The sermon Tuesday night was preached by Rev. John A. McClelland of the Presbyterian church, and was listened to by a congregation in which every church had representatives.

The meeting will be brought to a close on Sunday evening.

Tomorrow night Rev. Koser, of Eglon, will deliver the serman when all will be gladly welcomed.

Rev. McClelland Accepts Grafton Call.

Rev. J. A. McClelland of Oakland, was in the city last evening, meeting with the session of the First Presbyterian church, and at which time he accepted the call to the pastorate of the church here, tendered him a couple of weeks ago by unanimous consent of the congregation. Rev. McClelland is at present in charge of the Oakland and Terra Alta churches. Both of these churches recently tendered him a call singly, and they both wanted him so badly that it was stated at the time he was given a call here rather than disappoint one of the congregations in which he had become so deeply interested by accepting a call to the other. And this is where the Grafton church fares very well indeed. Rev. McClelland is one of the ablest ministers in the Grafton Presbytery, and since taking hold at Oakland and Terra Alta has accomplished great good. The good people of both those charges doubtless regret greatly to lose him. Rev. McClelland will come to the Grafton church on the 21st of April. The regular session of Presbytery meets early in April, when the change will be ratified by that body. The Rev. and fumily will occupy the manse, just next door to the church, recently erected, and which is now undergoing a thorough renovation in the way of new papering, interior decorating, &c. When Rev. McClelland accepted the call to the Grafton church he had also calls to the church at Pocomoke City, Md., and to a church in Vermont, his old home. The congregation of the Grafton Presbyterian church are congratulating one another heartily today upon securing the services of so able a man.—Grafton Sentinel.

When the above from our Grafton contemporary of Tuesday was brought to the attention of a member of the official board of the Oakland Presbyterian church the gentleman authorized this paper to state that Rev. McClelland was still the pastor of the Oakland congregation and that no action with respect to his removal from this point to Grafton could be had until after the Presbytery meeting to be held on April 6th and that the Oaklaud church has as good a chance to retain Rev. McClelland as the Grafton church has to secure him as its pastor, the laws of the church being such as to prohibit one congregafrom calling the pastor from another charge unless for good and sufficient reasons.

Closing of the Schools.

The public schools throughout the country will close for the present scholastic year on Friday, April 5th. The schools of Oakland will remain open until April 11th in order to make up lost time.

Card of Thanks.

We desire through the columns of this paper to thank our many friends and neighbors who so nobly gave us their assistance and sympathy during the illness and death of our infant daughter, Helen Louise Hoffman, born March 9th, died March 23rd.

MR. AND MRS. J. H. HOFFMAN.

There is no doubt but that a large percent of the degradation, disgrace, ruin and crime among the young springs from the habit of night prowling, corner loafing and kindred acts by both sexes in city, town or hamlet all over this broad country. Any person who keeps his or her eyes open knows this. Hundreds of boys and girls are out at night, and we all know that many influences for evil and none for good surround them continually. A curfew restriction may be derided as old-fashioned and Puritanical, but the fact remains that there is vastly less night prowling in towns that have a curfew ordinance and enforce it.

Friendsville Normal.

MOTTO: "Labor Omnia Vincit."

A Live Normal will open at Friendsville, Md., April 15, 1907, and continue ten weeks.

The design of this Normal shall not be to build a "royal road" to education's goal, but to inspire the teacher with cheerfulness and afford an opportunity for general fitness for the school room. This will command the best positions and highest salaries.

Those preparing for High School work will also be admitted.

Besides the current school branches opportunity will be given to study Latin Philosophy, Psychology, Geometry, Algebra, Elocution, etc. A special period each day will be given to Voice Culture both in Vocal Music and in Expression in Reading.

TWO INSTRUCTORS will thus be able to present to the Normal at Friendsville the best matter in the most pedagogical method.

Tuition, $5.00 and $6.00 per term.

Board reasonable and convenient.

JOCK

By GEORGE ETHELBERT WALSH.

Copyright, 1906, by George Ethelbert Walsh.

THIS isn't a dog story, but, come to think of it, a little brindly mongrel cur figures pretty prominently in it. Jock never posed as a hero, and I guess he isn't one. I've seen him run from a bigger dog, yelping for dear life and curling that tail between his legs like an ostrich burying its head in the sand.

Jock simply came to me, and I tolerated him because he showed so much affection for a forlorn, homesick engineer doing duty in a distant land.

Jock and I went everywhere, slept together, ate together and tramped the country like two old outcasts. But he wasn't good for much else than a companion. He was too lazy to keep awake at night to watch out for danger and too big a coward to stand between me and another man or animal.

When I was commissioned to inspect the new docks and piers that the government was having built in Manila bay Jock and I prepared for sundry little excursions along as pretty a coast as any man laid eyes on.

On the fifth day out from Manila we reached the new government dock, where heavy supplies for the army were to be landed for shipment to the interior. This was a large wooden affair running 500 feet into the bay. The contractors had just finished their work, and the government was waiting for my final report before accepting it.

The dock was firmly built of huge piles driven into the soft mud and sand and boarded up on both sides to keep the floating debris from collecting under it. There was an entrance under the dock at the extreme end, but one could enter it only at low tide.

It was a very hot day, and after making a close examination of the dock I decided at noon to eat lunch under the cool shade of the mammoth wooden floor and then take a nap.

Jock made no objection to this unspoken proposition, but wagged his tail with intuitive appreciation of my plans. I pushed the small, flat bottomed boat which carried our day's supplies under the dock and proceeded to enjoy myself.

The tide was very low, and I pushed the boat halfway up the shelving shore and left it with anchor thrown over the bow. Jock ate all the dinner I could not swallow and then patiently snuggled up to my side and blinked his eyes sleepily.

The place was very conducive to slumber, and I was soon fast asleep, and Jock was no better off. We must have slept for hours. I woke with a start and found darkness around us.

For a few moments I was too puzzled to make out my position. I could not believe that night was upon us, for it had been high noon when I lay down to rest. This impression was confirmed by a few stray beams of light filtering through the roof over my head.

Jock at first sleepily wagged his tail. Then, scenting danger, he whined and sniffed the air. I, too, was beginning to feel the presence of some evil.

When fully awake and mental faculties alert, I comprehended the danger of our situation at a glance. The tide had risen rapidly, and the entrance under the dock had been closed to us. The light which had flooded the place when we went asleep was thus shut out, and we were dependent upon a few feeble rays that made their way between cracks in the boards overhead.

I PUSHED THE SMALL, FLAT BOTTOMED BOAT UNDER THE DOCK.

"Hello, Jock! We're in a pickle!" I exclaimed.

Jock wagged his tail and tried to bark, but it only ended in a mournful whine.

"You little coward," I added in disgust. "You're a brave one to give a man moral courage!"

But I had little time to devote to moralizing or lecturing. I knew that the tide frequently rose to an extreme level, and I remembered that a series of unusually high tides had been running into the bay. If the water rose up to a level with the lower floor of the dock the situation would become very serious for both of us.

Now, I'm a fresh water man, hailing from one of the inland states where a puddle of water up to the ankles is considered a lake and a stream three feet deep a river of mighty volume. Therefore, I confess with shame, I hadn't learned the gentle art of swimming.

I pushed the boat toward the end of the pier, bumping my head repeatedly against the boards overhead. There, ten feet below the surface, I could see a path of light which showed me where the entrance to our prison was located. A good diver and swimmer could easily reach it and come up on the other side.

Jock looked down and wagged his tail, inviting me to dive. It was dog talk just as plain as day. I smiled with chagrin and shook my head.

I was not a kind to die easily, and while I had a few minutes of respite

THE BOAT SUDDENLY TIPPED AND ROLLED STRAIGHT OVER.

I exhausted every possible study of the situation. I pushed around the piles and shook the boards, hoping to find one loose, but the contractors had performed their work well.

There was no use calling for help, for there was no possibility of any one being within five miles of the place. So I didn't waste much strength in that way.

There was only three feet of space between the boat and the boards overhead. At the rate the tide was rising I should have nearly an hour before the climax could be reached. I tried to console myself with the thought that I was safe. The water would force the boat up toward the roof, but by lying down in it we could wait for the turn of the tide. I took measurements and found that with six inches of space we could escape if we took care not to rock the boat.

On the other hand, if the water crept up beyond that point the boat would be swamped, and I would have no choice other than to sink like a log. Jock might swim around and eventually escape, but for me there was no escape.

The thought of such an end sent the cold shivers down my spine. It was difficult to sit there and wait for the end. I lit my pipe and tried to smoke, but my courage oozed out slowly, and twice the pipe went out. Then I put it away and took another measurement.

I turned pale with apprehension. The tide had gained a foot and a half. By aid of the dim light I looked at my watch. The time for high tide was still half an hour off.

I realized then that my fate was sealed. The water would reach to a level with the floor of the dock, and I would drown. I tried to picture the scene of the final struggle. In fancy I experienced all the sensations of death.

Jock must have been thinking of the same thing, for he suddenly grew nervous and excited. He whined and whimpered and chased up and down the boat. I tried to grab him to stifle his cries, but he avoided me and finally leaped overboard.

That splash in the water brought more alarm to me than anything else. Jock was deserting me, and, like a drowning man clinging to his support of straw, I grabbed for the dog to haul him back.

I must have leaned heavily on the side of the boat, for it suddenly tipped and rolled straight over, turning turtle so quickly that I was in the water before I could think. Fortunately I had presence of mind enough to grasp the sides. I clung to this support and gasped for breath.

I tried in vain to turn the boat over. It would have been a stupendous job in that narrow space for an expert swimmer; for me it was absolutely impossible.

The top of the boat was within a few inches of the dock overhead, and I could not climb upon it. I simply clung to it and shivered. Jock swam around and around the overturned craft, whining and begging me to leave it, but there was no alternative, and I clung desperately to the slippery bottom.

The water rose inch by inch. First the bottom of the boat bumped against the boards overhead; then it was held firmly in position, and the tide climbed higher, marking the rise on the sides.

When there was only six inches of space in which to breathe I began to lose all hope. At five inches the lapping waves frequently slapped the briny water in my mouth. I craned my head backward, forcing my mouth and nose as near the boards of the roof as possible. Jock was by my side doing the same.

But he took it less silently and calmly. He spluttered and whined and made frantic efforts to bore his nose through the obdurate boards. I was fast losing control of my muscles, for horrible fear was paralyzing my will. The frantic terror of the drowning man was taking possession of me.

The water was now filling my mouth and nostrils with every gentle undulation of the surface. I spluttered and gasped and made more frantic struggles than Jock.

My senses were deserting me when Jock suddenly slipped from my side and disappeared. My first thought was that the poor dog had succumbed and was dead. Then I concluded that he had made a strike for life and liberty at the final moment.

This impression was apparently verified a moment later. I heard Jock's bark in the distance. The sound was far away and muffled, but it seemed to come from overhead. He had escaped!

Then the impossibility of it dawned upon my mind. There had been no time for him to dive under the dock and reach the top of it. But, if not, the dog had found a place of security. His natural instinct had led him to some safe nook which I had overlooked.

This thought possessed me and brought renewed hope to my failing spirit. I would follow Jock's lead and then yield to the inevitable without a murmur.

But where was Jock? That puzzled me. I tried to locate his muffled cry. It sounded so near and yet so distant!

Something impelled me to strike out under the boat with one arm, and my hand came in contact with something soft and furry. It was Jock, and had I not heard his constant and persistent bark I should have concluded he was strangling to death under the boat.

A man's wits act quickly in moments of great danger, or at least they do sometimes. Mine worked with lightning-like rapidity then. I reasoned that I could live where Jock could, and I plunged my head under the boat and grasped upward for support.

I found myself a moment later clinging to the seat of the overturned boat, with my head bumping against the bottom, but with more space for breathing than I had enjoyed for some time. It was total darkness there, but the air was fresh and invigorating. Jock was fawning by my side and whimpering with delight.

I reasoned out the explanation of it in a flash. In turning over so suddenly the boat had imprisoned a lot of air, and the rising water had held it. The bottom and sides of the boat were both air and water tight. Jock had found the place of escape either accidentally or by instinct.

I REACHED UNDER THE BOAT.

I breathed easier and found my position more comfortable. There was a good six inch space for the head, and I could rest my elbows under the seat of the boat. It was all a question now of whether there was sufficient air to support the two of us for half an hour or less. By that time, I judged, the tide would turn, and we could crawl out.

The water could not rise up higher under the boat on account of the imprisoned air, but our breathing steadily exhausted the oxygen of the latter and added to our discomfort.

My nerves grew tense and snappy, and my senses began to reel. Jock, too, ceased to bark and whine. A great slumber appeared to possess us. How long we had been there I had no way to judge, but when my head seemed ready to split I could stand it no longer. I must have fresh air!

I ducked my head under the gunwales of the boat and crawled out. There was a moment of sputtering and gasping and then a deep breath of fresh air that sent the blood tingling through my whole body.

The tide had turned, and there was space enough under the dock to live and breathe in comfort. I filled my lungs until they ceased their panting. Then, remembering Jock, I reached under the boat and hauled his nearly lifeless body up to the fresh air.

When the tide fell low enough for us to crawl upon the bottom of the boat I flung myself at full length on it and rested. Jock spread himself out by my side ready as ever to rest and sleep.

Later I examined the high level of the tide under the dock and found that the water had come up to within half an inch of the boards. No man could have lived there, and had not Jock found the fresh air under the boat neither of us would be here to testify to the truthfulness of this tale.

But Jock doesn't pose as a hero, and I'm not saying that he is one, but you must admit I owe my life to him.

THE LONELY HONEYMOON.

You know dees Joe dat use' to go
For work weeth me, signore?
He's marry yestaday, you know,
An' gon' for Baltimore,
An' so deesgusta man like Joe
You nevva see bayfore.

Eh? No; da girl's all right, my frand;
Dat's mak' eet harder too.
Ha, wait an' you weell ondrastand;
I tal eet all to you.
You see, dees Joe long time ago
Gat Rosa for hees mash,
An' evra seence he worka so
For mak' an' save da cash,
Baycause he want gat marry soon
An' mebbe takin', too.
Dees—w'at you calla—"honeymoon,"
Like 'Mericana do.
Wan day he tak' fi-dollar note
An' go to steamship store
An' buy two teecket for da boat
Dat sail for Baltimore.
An' den he tal me: "Shut your mout'
An' justa looka wise.
Dees theeng ees no for talka 'bout;
Eet gona be su'prise."
So, w'en dey marry yestaday
He smile so proud, signore,
W'en he ees keesa her cheek an' say,
"We sail for Baltimore"'
Ah, den, my frand, so sadda sight
You nevva see, oh, my!
Poor Rosa, she ees gat so white
An' ees baygeen to cry.
"Ees dees," she say, "a weddin' treep?
Sooch fooleeshness you speak!"
I no can stand eet een a sheep;
Da sea ees mak' me seeck."
Poor Joe, he swear, an' den he keess
An' coax an' beg her so,
For theenk of all dat she weell meess.
But no, she weell no go.
"Oh, Rosa, mia," Joe ees cry
"Your heart eet ees a stone,
For dat you mak' me say goodby
An' tak' da treep alone!"

Oh, lonely honeymoon, an', oh,
So sadda man, signore.
Dat gotta leave hees wife an' go
Alone for Baltimore!
So hearta broka man like Joe
You nevva see bayfore.

The Boss Was On.

"I have come to tell you," said the employee who had been busy feathering his own nest with the company's money, "that my health is failing."

"So?" said the boss coldly.

"Yes," said the employee, with a hollow cough. "The doctor says I can't hold out much longer."

"Oh, I don't know," said the boss still more coldly. "Maybe if you had 'held out' less you'd be able to hold out longer." And the employee went away with a dazed feeling that all was not well with the little knockdown game he had thought was so supersmooth.—Judge.

JOCK

By GEORGE ETHELBERT WALSH.

Copyright, 1906, by George Ethelbert Walsh.

THIS isn't a dog story, but, come to think of it, a little brindly mongrel cur figures pretty prominently in it. Jock never posed as a hero, and I guess he isn't one. I've seen him run from a bigger dog, yelping for dear life and curling that tail between his legs like an ostrich burying its head in the sand.

Jock simply came to me, and I tolerated him because he showed so much affection for a forlorn, homesick engineer doing duty in a distant land.

Jock and I went everywhere, slept together, ate together and tramped the country like two old outcasts. But he wasn't good for much else than a companion. He was too lazy to keep awake at night to watch out for danger and too big a coward to stand between me and another man or animal.

When I was commissioned to inspect the new docks and piers that the government was having built in Manila bay Jock and I prepared for sundry little excursions along as pretty a coast as any man laid eyes on.

On the fifth day out from Manila we reached the new government dock, where heavy supplies for the army were to be landed for shipment to the interior. This was a large wooden affair running 500 feet into the bay. The contractors had just finished their work, and the government was waiting for my final report before accepting it.

The dock was firmly built of huge piles driven into the soft mud and sand and boarded up on both sides to keep the floating debris from collecting under it. There was an entrance under the dock at the extreme end, but one could enter it only at low tide.

It was a very hot day, and after making a close examination of the dock I decided at noon to eat lunch under the cool shade of the mammoth wooden floor and then take a nap.

Jock made no objection to this unspoken proposition, but wagged his tail with intuitive appreciation of my plans. I pushed the small, flat bottomed boat which carried our day's supplies under the dock and proceeded to enjoy myself.

The tide was very low, and I pushed the boat halfway up the shelving shore and left it with anchor thrown over the bow. Jock ate all the dinner I could not swallow and then patiently snuggled up to my side and blinked his eyes sleepily.

The place was very conducive to slumber, and I was soon fast asleep, and Jock was no better off. We must have slept for hours. I woke with a start and found darkness around us.

For a few moments I was too puzzled to make out my position. I could not believe that night was upon us, for it had been high noon when I lay down to rest. This impression was confirmed by a few stray beams of light filtering through the roof over my head.

Jock at first sleepily wagged his tail. Then, scenting danger, he whined and sniffed the air. I, too, was beginning to feel the presence of some evil.

When fully awake and mental faculties alert, I comprehended the danger of our situation at a glance. The tide had risen rapidly, and the entrance under the dock had been closed to us. The light which had flooded the place when we went asleep was thus shut out, and we were dependent upon a few feeble rays that made their way between cracks in the boards overhead.

I PUSHED THE SMALL, FLAT BOTTOMED BOAT UNDER THE DOCK.

"Hello, Jock! We're in a pickle!" I exclaimed.

Jock wagged his tail and tried to bark, but it only ended in a mournful whine.

"You little coward," I added in disgust. "You're a brave one to give a man moral courage!"

But I had little time to devote to moralizing or lecturing. I knew that the tide frequently rose to an extreme level, and I remembered that a series of unusually high tides had been running into the bay. If the water rose up to a level with the lower floor of the dock the situation would become very serious for both of us.

Now, I'm a fresh water man, hailing from one of the inland states where a puddle of water up to the ankles is considered a lake and a stream three feet deep a river of mighty volume. Therefore, I confess with shame, I hadn't learned the gentle art of swimming.

I pushed the boat toward the end of the pier, bumping my head repeatedly against the boards overhead. There, ten feet below the surface, I could see a path of light which showed me where the entrance to our prison was located. A good diver and swimmer could easily reach it and come up on the other side.

Jock looked down and wagged his tail, inviting me to dive. It was dog talk just as plain as day. I smiled with chagrin and shook my head.

I was not a kind to die easily, and while I had a few minutes of respite

THE BOAT SUDDENLY TIPPED AND ROLLED STRAIGHT OVER.

I exhausted every possible study of the situation. I pushed around the piles and shook the boards, hoping to find one loose, but the contractors had performed their work well.

There was no use calling for help, for there was no possibility of any one being within five miles of the place. So I didn't waste much strength in that way.

There was only three feet of space between the boat and the boards overhead. At the rate the tide was rising I should have nearly an hour before the climax could be reached. I tried to console myself with the thought that I was safe. The water would force the boat up toward the roof, but by lying down in it we could wait for the turn of the tide. I took measurements and found that with six inches of space we could escape if we took care not to rock the boat.

On the other hand, if the water crept up beyond that point the boat would be swamped, and I would have no choice other than to sink like a log. Jock might swim around and eventually escape, but for me there was no escape.

The thought of such an end sent the cold shivers down my spine. It was difficult to sit there and wait for the end. I lit my pipe and tried to smoke, but my courage oozed out slowly, and twice the pipe went out. Then I put it away and took another measurement.

I turned pale with apprehension. The tide had gained a foot and a half. By aid of the dim light I looked at my watch. The time for high tide was still half an hour off.

I realized then that my fate was sealed. The water would reach to a level with the floor of the dock, and I would drown. I tried to picture the scene of the final struggle. In fancy I experienced all the sensations of death.

Jock must have been thinking of the same thing, for he suddenly grew nervous and excited. He whined and whimpered and chased up and down the boat. I tried to grab him to stifle his cries, but he avoided me and finally leaped overboard.

That splash in the water brought more alarm to me than anything else. Jock was deserting me, and, like a drowning man clinging to his support of straw, I grabbed for the dog to haul him back.

I must have leaned heavily on the side of the boat, for it suddenly tipped and rolled straight over, turning turtle so quickly that I was in the water before I could think. Fortunately I had presence of mind enough to grasp the sides. I clung to this support and gasped for breath.

I tried in vain to turn the boat over. It would have been a stupendous job in that narrow space for an expert swimmer; for me it was absolutely impossible.

The top of the boat was within a few inches of the dock overhead, and I could not climb upon it. I simply clung to it and shivered. Jock swam around and around the overturned craft, whining and begging me to leave it, but there was no alternative, and I clung desperately to the slippery bottom.

The water rose inch by inch. First the bottom of the boat bumped against the boards overhead; then it was held firmly in position, and the tide climbed higher, marking the rise on the sides.

When there was only six inches of space in which to breathe I began to lose all hope. At five inches the lapping waves frequently slapped the briny water in my mouth. I craned my head backward, forcing my mouth and nose as near the boards of the roof as possible. Jock was by my side doing the same.

But he took it less silently and calmly. He spluttered and whined and made frantic efforts to bore his nose through the obdurate boards. I was fast losing control of my muscles, for horrible fear was paralyzing my will. The frantic terror of the drowning man was taking possession of me.

The water was now filling my mouth and nostrils with every gentle undulation of the surface. I spluttered and gasped and made more frantic struggles than Jock.

My senses were deserting me when Jock suddenly slipped from my side and disappeared. My first thought was that the poor dog had succumbed and was dead. Then I concluded that he had made a strike for life and liberty at the final moment.

This impression was apparently verified a moment later. I heard Jock's bark in the distance. The sound was far away and muffled, but it seemed to come from overhead. He had escaped!

Then the impossibility of it dawned upon my mind. There had been no time for him to dive under the dock and reach the top of it. But, if not, the dog had found a place of security. His natural instinct had led him to some safe nook which I had overlooked.

This thought possessed me and brought renewed hope to my failing spirit. I would follow Jock's lead and then yield to the inevitable without a murmur.

But where was Jock? That puzzled me. I tried to locate his muffled cry. It sounded so near and yet so distant!

Something impelled me to strike out under the boat with one arm, and my hand came in contact with something soft and furry. It was Jock, and had I not heard his constant and persistent bark I should have concluded he was strangling to death under the boat.

A man's wits act quickly in moments of great danger, or at least they do sometimes. Mine worked with lightning-like rapidity then. I reasoned that I could live where Jock could, and I plunged my head under the boat and grasped upward for support.

I found myself a moment later clinging to the seat of the overturned boat, with my head bumping against the bottom, but with more space for breathing than I had enjoyed for some time. It was total darkness there, but the air was fresh and invigorating. Jock was fawning by my side and whimpering with delight.

I reasoned out the explanation of it in a flash. In turning over so suddenly the boat had imprisoned a lot of air, and the rising water had held it. The bottom and sides of the boat were both air and water tight. Jock had found the place of escape either accidentally or by instinct.

I REACHED UNDER THE BOAT.

I breathed easier and found my position more comfortable. There was a good six inch space for the head, and I could rest my elbows under the seat of the boat. It was all a question now of whether there was sufficient air to support the two of us for half an hour or less. By that time, I judged, the tide would turn, and we could crawl out.

The water could not rise up higher under the boat on account of the imprisoned air, but our breathing steadily exhausted the oxygen of the latter and added to our discomfort.

My nerves grew tense and snappy, and my senses began to reel. Jock, too, ceased to bark and whine. A great slumber appeared to possess us. How long we had been there I had no way to judge, but when my head seemed ready to split I could stand it no longer. I must have fresh air!

I ducked my head under the gunwales of the boat and crawled out. There was a moment of sputtering and gasping and then a deep breath of fresh air that sent the blood tingling through my whole body.

The tide had turned, and there was space enough under the dock to live and breathe in comfort. I filled my lungs until they ceased their panting. Then, remembering Jock, I reached under the boat and hauled his nearly lifeless body up to the fresh air.

When the tide fell low enough for us to crawl upon the bottom of the boat I flung myself at full length on it and rested. Jock spread himself out by my side ready as ever to rest and sleep.

Later I examined the high level of the tide under the dock and found that the water had come up to within half an inch of the boards. No man could have lived there, and had not Jock found the fresh air under the boat neither of us would be here to testify to the truthfulness of this tale.

But Jock doesn't pose as a hero, and I'm not saying that he is one, but you must admit I owe my life to him.

THE LONELY HONEYMOON.

You know dees Joe dat use' to go
For work weeth me, signore?
He's marry yestaday, you know,
An' gon' for Baltimore,
An' so deesgusta man like Joe
You nevva see bayfore.

Eh? No; da girl's all right, my frand;
Dat's mak' eet harder too.
Ha, wait an' you weell ondrastand;
I tal eet all to you.
You see, dees Joe long time ago
Gat Rosa for hees mash,
An' evra seence he worka so
For mak' an' save da cash.
Baycause he want gat marry soon
An' mebbe takin', too,
Dees—w'at you calla—"honeymoon,"
Like 'Mericana do.
Wan day he tak' fi-dollar note
An' go to steamship store
An' buy two teecket for da boat
Dat sail for Baltimore.
An' den he tal me: "Shut your mout'
An' justa looka wise.
Dees theeng ees no for talka 'bout;
Eet gona be su'prise."
So, w'en dey marry yestaday
He smile so proud, signore,
W'en he ees keess her cheek an' say,
"We sail for Baltimore!"
Ah, den, my frand, so sadda sight
You nevva see, oh, my!
Poor Rosa, she ees gat so white
An' ees baygeen to cry.
"Ees dees," she say, "a weddin' treep?
Sooch fooleeshness you speak!"
I no can stand eet een a sheep;
Da sea ees mak' me seeck."
Poor Joe, he swear, an' den he keess
An' coax an' beg her so,
For theenk of all dat she weell meess.
But no, she weell no go.
"Oh, Rosa, mia," Joe ees cry
"Your heart eet ees a stone,
For dat you mak' me say goodby
An' tak' da treep alone!"

Oh, lonely honeymoon, an', oh,
So sadda man, signore.
Dat gotta leave hees wife an' go
Alone for Baltimore!
So hearta broka man like Joe
You nevva see bayfore.

The Boss Was On.

"I have come to tell you," said the employee who had been busy feathering his own nest with the company's money, "that my health is failing."

"So?" said the boss coldly.

"Yes," said the employee, with a hollow cough. "The doctor says I can't hold out much longer."

"Oh, I don't know," said the boss still more coldly. "Maybe if you had 'held out' less you'd be able to hold out longer." And the employee went away with a dazed feeling that all was not well with the little knockdown game he had thought was so supersmooth.—Judge.

The Problem of Immigration.

By ISIDOR STRAUS, Millionaire, New York Merchant and President of the Educational Alliance

THOSE of us who were fortunate enough to have found homes in this benign country years ago or through generations before us would indeed be false to the principles ON WHICH OUR GOVERNMENT WAS FOUNDED were we not ready to lend a helping hand to men, women and children driven to our shores by cruel persecution and atrocities that would blacken the pages of history of the darkest ages.

I have no patience with the selfishness and egotism which would bar out these victims of inhumanity by laws or regulations that would have deported many of the protestors themselves OR THEIR PROGENITORS, who now count themselves among the blueblood of the country, as if it belonged to them EXCLUSIVELY by heritage.

It is to combat the claims of the narrow minded, heartless, soulless agitators whose pleas that these immigrants will prove a MENACE TO THE WELFARE OF THE COUNTRY that the Educational alliance was organized, and we are constantly seeing proofs unmistakable how readily the most unpromising specimens, if outward appearances were a just estimate of the soul within, can be ASSIMILATED and made valuable additions to the most desirable class of useful citizens.

THERE CAN BE NO DOUBT THAT THIS COUNTRY'S WELFARE AND WEALTH FOR A CENTURY TO COME, AS FOR A CENTURY PAST, CAN BE MATERIALLY QUICKENED BY A CONTINUANCE OF IMMIGRATION.

The only problem connected therewith is how to avoid unwholesome congestion and the question of PROPER DISTRIBUTION, and none other need cause us any concern. To this our communal workers are beginning to devote their earnest thought, and I have no fear but that a solution will be found, as it has been for every question that has confronted the enterprising spirit of our progressive, energetic people.

While our task has been to awaken a proper appreciation of the privileges of citizenship and the duties which it in turn imposes, to discriminate between the meaning of LIBERTY AND LICENSE, we have not ignored the difficulties and drawbacks of too much crowding in the cities along the north Atlantic coast and recognized the importance of stimulating every effort that is being made to facilitate and encourage the distribution of the masses to sections WHERE IMMIGRATION IS SORELY NEEDED and welcomed with open arms.

The 3,000,000 square miles of contiguous territory which the United States comprises, with a population of about 85,000,000, give us less than twenty-eight persons to the square mile. Is it, therefore, not PREPOSTEROUS for people who are themselves either immigrants or the sons or grandsons of immigrants—which three classes constitute more than half of the entire population of the country—to lend their ears to any specious plea for the imposition of new and additional restrictions on the ground that THE WELFARE OF THE COUNTRY demands it.

Wealth's Rule of Colleges.

By President NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER of Columbia University.

WE all feel the pressure of the interests we call economic. WE MUST ALL MAKE A LIVELIHOOD. Our first and most direct concern is the solution of the economic problem. When that is settled the intelligent man naturally asks what is the use of working and striving for a living. The answer comes back immediately—that we may share in the life of human beings as distinguished from the brute creation.

Our purpose is to obtain leisure, so as to be able to lead HUMAN lives. The solution of the difficult economic problem is not enough unless we raise ourselves TO THE HUMAN PLANE. That is what education is all about. It is the place of the university to carry out that thought. Universities are one of the very oldest of institutions in the world. They grew out of the desire of man to establish a political, a governmental state, a religion and an educational system.

The university in a democracy must be detached from controversy and yet be in touch with the popular will and aspirations. In a democracy a university should teach truth or forfeit its name.

NO UNIVERSITY SHOULD SELL ITSELF TO THE MOB THROUGH FEAR OR TO THE MILLIONAIRE FOR A DONATION.

The pure light of reason alone should be its guide. Our universities every year are becoming more successful in meeting these ideals.

One function of a university in a democracy is to render lofty, experienced and learned service AT THE PEOPLE'S COMMAND. In the struggle for existence there is danger that the people may be turned into a purely commercial body. Among foreigners we have that reputation already, but I thank God we have not become so.

OUR HISTORY ABOUNDS WITH IDEALISM, LOVE OF LIBERTY AND A DESIRE TO DO JUSTICE.

"Americans Have No Manners"

By F. HOPKINSON SMITH, Author and Artist.

THERE are no manners nowadays in the United States. We have NO TIME TO BE POLITE, just as we have no time for any literature, except that suited to a street car or a railroad journey. New Yorkers in particular live at such speed that I don't know where they will bring up. There is no such thing as COURTESY among them. We hear a great deal there of other cities being behind the times.

PEOPLE, HOWEVER, ARE GETTING TO HUNT OUT THESE BEHIND THE TIMES PLACES AFTER AWHILE, AS THEY WOULD AN OASIS IN THE DESERT, TO LIVE IN.

IN OLD JERUSALEM.

Miss Blanche Davis Writes from Ancient City.

Rev. S. W. Davis, of Wilkinsburg, Pa., has received the following letter from his daughter, Miss Blanche Davis, written in Jerusalem, who left Mt. Lake last summer for a tour of the old world:

Jerusalem, Feb. 19, 1907.

My Dear Father:

I decided to write to you from Jerusalem because I thought you would be more interested than any one else, for you have been here yourself. We have had a very interesting time so far, and are now in Jerusalem. We sailed from Port Said Sunday night, the 17th, and arrived in Jaffa on Monday at noon. We landed in little boats with the toughest looking Turks imaginable and on a very rough sea. We could not go through the little passage between the rocks, for it was too rough. After getting settled at our hotel we took carriages and drove to the house where Dorcas lived and died and was raised from the dead. I don't know whether her tomb was discovered when you were there or not, but we saw it this time, and also the church erected near the home in memoriam. We then went to the house of Simon, the tanner, which you described in your book. Mary and I have been reading it this evening. We went up on the roof, saw the well, but did not drink any of the water as you did. No wonder you got sick. Do you know I forget what water tastes like, it has been so long since I have had any.

We left at seven in the morning by a good train for Jerusalem. We passed over the plain and I picked a rose of Sharon for you at one of the stations. It is enclosed with this letter. There are so many beautiful orange groves here. The oranges are very large and they are very cheap—a basket containing about twenty for less than a franc. We had luncheon at the hotel before starting out. The first place we went to was the Consulate for mail then to the church of the Sepulcher. There were a great many Russian pilgrims visiting it and making offerings at the supposed tomb and place of the crucifixion. We went across the street from it to St. John's church and to a Russian church, then along the Via Doloroso up to a Catholic orphanage. Down under the building fifteen feet is the real Via Doloroso, and we saw it and also the judgment seat of Pilate.

The next morning we started for Jericho by carriage. The road is quite good in spots and the scenery is beautiful. We drove over the hills until we saw below us the plain of the Dead Sea and beyond the mountains of Moab. We had luncheon at the hotel and drove across the plain about five miles, to the Dead Sea. It certainly is beautiful but we didn't like the taste of it. Isn't it terrible? It was quite rough and covered with thick foam. I suppose it was caused by the salt. After taking several pictures we drove again in another direction to the River Jordan. Talk about disappointment! It's the most insignificant, muddy excuse for a river I ever saw. Uncle Sumner baptized two little girls who were with us, out in the river, at sunset, almost in the shadow of the mountain from which Moses looked over the plain.

We drove back past the place where Gilgal was, to the hotel and went to bed. It was real spooky to be there and listen to the jackals howling out on the plain. We got up early in the morning and started back to Jerusalem. We stopped at Bethany and saw the supposed tomb of Lazarus and the ruin of the house of Mary and Martha.

We arrived in Jerusalem in time for luncheon, and afterwards went down to the big quarry from which King Solomon took the stone for the temple, then to Jeremiah's grotto where he is supposed to have written the Lamentations and to the tomb of Christ in the garden. It looks more like the pictures you see than the one in the church of the Sepulcher. * * *

We left Jerusalem next morning by carriage for Hebron. We saw Solomon's pool on the way. It was a beautiful drive. The roads were fine and the country was so much prettier than that on the way to Jericho.

You know Hebron is the place where Abraham was, and there is a mosque built over his tomb. No one but Mohammedans are allowed in it, and we didn't care much. There is not much in Hebron, but Uncle Sumner thought we'd better take the trip because of the history of the place. On the way back we stopped at Bethlehem. The church of the Nativity is built over the place where Christ is supposed to have been born. It is divided into three parts, the Undenominational, the Greek and the Roman Catholic. A Mohammedan soldier is stationed between the Greek and the Roman parts to keep their priests from tearing each other to pieces. We saw the place where Christ was borne and the manger. There were many people who came up and kissed the places. We didn't indulge in any such ceremony, thought. From an elevation we had a fine view of the town and the field where the shepherds watched. It was very interesting.

We spent the last day seeing the rest of Jerusalem, the Mount of Olives and Gethsemene. The leaf I enclose is from an olive tree in the Garden of Gethsemene. It is supposed to have stood in the time of Christ, We went to the room of the Last Supper and through the Valley of Hinnom the Jews wailing place was really sad. Every day they gather at the only remnant of the old wall of the city and wail and beat their heads against the wall in sorrow over the loss of the city.

The day we came home from Hebron we, with some other girls at the hotel, powdered our hair and dressed as much like Colonials as our wardrobes allowed. Maybe we didn't surprise the people, though. It was lots of fun but seemed strange to have a George Washington party in Jerusalem.

Very lovingly,
Blanche.

Letter to F. A. Thayer.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: No man is in a position to influence men with regard to their property more than you in that little room where they tell you their troubles. Pity, if you don't know how to keep a house dry and sound, any sort of structure, house store factory warehouse shop barn fence—any sort of fence, except rail; with paint.

What paint? The paint that takes least gallons; for paint costs money, and putting it on costs twice as much as the paint.

That is short; but that's all; it includes the rest. One paint wears long, another wears short; but the one that wears long is the least-gallons paint; least-gallons means pure and strong; and most-gallons means adulterated and weak, besides small gallons.

Paint is one of the biggest interests in the United States; not the business of making it; no, the business of paint, taking care of property. Paint is worth a great deal more than it costs, and the best costs least: Devoe.

Yours truly,
19 F. W. DEVOE & Co.

THE ORIGIN OF EASTER.

Traced From Pagan Customs to the Christian Symbolism—The Egg and the Rabbit.

If some one were to ask what Easter stands for ninety-nine people out of a hundred would answer casually that it testifies to the rising of Christ. This is the conventional answer and it is true so far as it goes; but it does not go far enough to be a very good answer. The Pathfinder has, I believe, pointed out on former occasions the general facts of the matter, but the ignorance on the subject that still prevails shows that a resurvey of the history of the festival will be justified.

In the first place the east has from time immemorial been venerated in a religious way. People looked in that quarter for the rising of the sun and in time the east took on a special sacredness as symbolizing light, the rebirth of nature and the promise of new life. Even down to recent times the custom was common among Christians of facing the east when mentioning the name of Jesus; churches were studiously built with their altars to the east; people were buried with their feet to the east so as to be facing in that direction at the resurrection, etc.

The symbolism about the never-ending miracle of the rebirth of life runs strongly through all the religious and popular lore of the east. In the east it is understood, but in the west not, because its origin has been obscured. Just as each morning's rising sun typified new light and life, so the reawakening of nature in spring, after the death of winter, took on a second meaning. The season of the vernal equinox thus came to be marked by special special religions observance. The custom of presenting colored eggs to friends as symbols of the season became widespread. This custom appears to have originated among the Persians, and it evidently bore reference to the mundane egg, for which Ormuzd and Ahriman were to contend till the consummation of all things.

The egg was suggestive of recreation, for does it not contain the emorio of all that is to come after. So also the rabbit, as the symbol of fertility and prolific reproduction, was adopted into the symbolism of the season. The Romans used both the egg and the rabbit in rites attending their spring festival. We still use the same thing—but how many are there who stop to think or inquire why they use them? Among the Jews the Passover became the great spring festival; it was a kind of a thanksgiving day commemorating their deliverance when the angel of the Lord smote the first-born of the Egyptians but "passed over" the Israelites. The Jews ate a lamb at this festival, as we eat turkey at Thanksgiving and Christmas, and in time the lamb became a symbol of Christ. They also eat eggs at this time.

The early Christian Church found these customs too deeply rooted among the people to be ignored, and with characteristic tact and judgment the Church authorities adopted them and applied to them a new significance. In Northern Europe the goddess called Easter was joyfully worshipped as the deity of spring and the term "Easter Day" was in accepted use, whereas in the south the term "Pasch," from the Hebrew word applied to the Passover, was employed in the same connection. Numerous variations of the Hebrew word, such as "pass," "paschal," "paque," etc., are still commonly used as synonyms with Easter.

It should be remembered that the ancient custom was to have the year begin in the spring. It is this that explains the apparent nomaly of our months of September to December being so named, for in those days September, for instance was the "seventh" month, as the name in Latin applies. No doubt the Church authorities would have had the year begin at Easter, had it not been that Easter was a movable and not a fixed feast, being founded on the lunar calendar. The date January 1 for the beginning of the year was purely arbitrary, and it was only accepted after centuries after experimenting with other dates. As it was, the reckoning of the year from Easter was in use in Europe down to as late as 1800 in some places, in spite of the inconvenience of this system; while in other sections the now year was begun at Christmas.

The Church authorities, who were nearly all-powerful in matters affecting the calendar, would likewise have made Easter a fixed festival, as it logically should have been to commemorate the Savior's rising, but the idea of the day as being connected with the Jewish paschal moon could not be eradicated from the popular mind. It was to remove all uncertainty about Easter that Pope Gregory XIII. revised the Julian Calendar. He tried to devise some plan that would never allow Easter and the Jewish Passover to fall on the same date, but they do coincide once in a while. Easter day was fixed as the first Sunday after paschal full moon, that is in a general way the Sunday after the full moon occurring on or after March 21. The Church calculations, however, are founded on very old moon tables, and it is for this reason that Easter falls sometimes a week earlier or later than it would if regulated by the actual moon. It can come as early as March 21 or as late as April 25, and various other Church festivals are determined by it.

It took but little readjustment to give the pagan Easter a Christian significance, though the fixing of the festival by the moon had to be conceded. The association of Easter with the rising of the sun, the dawn of day, the rebirth of life after winter, and joy at the hope of a rich garner for the season was readily engrafted into the Christian symbology. Christ represented the sun, the light and Easter His resurrection; the thanksgiving for the past, the joy of the present, and the hope for the future were all beautifully appropriate to the new interpretation of the festival.

Stallions for Sale.

CALL FOR NATIONAL ROAD.

Appeal to Have Famous Highway Rebuilt by the Government.

The National Good Roads association, with headquarters in St. Louis, has sent out the following appeal to motorists, says the New York American:

"The National Good Roads association is a powerful force for good, and its work is accomplishing results in all parts of the United States. It is engaged in many things that will benefit the people. One of the great schemes it has in mind and which it has set about to accompiish is the repair and rebuilding of the great national road across Maryland, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio and Indiana.

"That memorable road was intended to be one of the highways between the east and west before railroads were known. It was built at great expense, costing the federal government over $7,000,000, and during the early days was a famous highway over which thousands traveled every week. When the railroads came into existence the national road was neglected, and today it is only a skeleton of what it once was.

"It is proposed to rebuild it, and the National Good Roads association has undertaken to have it done by the government. The length of the road is about 700 miles, and it can be rebuilt for less than $7,000,000. That is about the cost of one good battleship, and we are building lots of them. The appropriation of that sum to make this old road across five states would do as much good as the average battleship, for not one such ship in ten will ever get in a fight. Then when the old road has been put in good shape to the Mississippi river it may be that the price of about three other battleships will be set aside to build the road to the Pacific coast.

"One first class continuous highway across the continent would be a great thing. Many a traveler would spend two or three months going and coming by team, bicycle, automobile or otherwise. It would be easy for the nation to do a thing like this.

"In 1905 150,000 Americans visited Europe and for the privilege of going over the first class European roads paid over $500,000."

They always stay—those who get their barbering done at Clyde Liller's Railroad street shop.

MR. J. C. BRYDON HAS RESIGNED

He Retires as General Manager of Davis Coal & Coke Co.

Saturday afternoon Mr. John C. Brydon sent in his resignation as general manager of the Davis Coal and Coke Company, with headquarters in Cumberland, to take effect at once. Mr. Brydon explaining his action, said that he had followed his friends, Messrs. Winslow S. Pierce, president, and Fairfax S. Landstreet, vice-president, of the Western Maryland, and Thomas B. Davis, Jr., vice-president of the Davis Coal and Coke Company, with headquarters at 1 Broadway, New York. Mr. Davis is a nephew of ex-Senator Henry G. Davis, the veteran Democrat and founder of the coal and coke company. Mr. Brydon stated that he could not tell of his future movements, but said he would remain in Cumberland for a time at least.

It is understood that many resignations are the result of the desire of President Bush to have men prominently linked with the Gould interests fill these places.

The Davis Coal and Coke Company, under the recently enacted law, which will soon be effective, will be entirely divorced from the railroad management, railroads not being allowed to operate coal mines.

Mr. Brydon said his action was contemplated several days ago, while in the South, he and Mrs. Brydon having been at Palm Beach, whence they were called by the death of Mr. Brydon's father, Mr. William A. Brydon, which occurred at Bloomington, Md.

It is understood that the salary of Mr. Brydon as general manager was $10,000 a year, he having held the position since June 1, 1906. He had been general superintendent of the Consolidation Coal Company and the Somerset Coal Company, and previous to that had been superintendent of the Somerset Coal Company for 11 years. He was with the Davis Coal and Coke Company before going with the Consolidation interests, as superintendent of the Thomas mine. He began the coal business in his youth, his father having been a pioneer coal operator, and he had always been close to the Davis interests in West Virginia.

Heavy Lumber Shipment.

The month just passed has been the busiest for many lumber concerns operating in this section of the country in the history of the lumber industry. The Ravenscroft Lumber Company reports shipments aggregating sixty-five car loads to points in all parts of the country. This record is the best yet made by the Ravenscroft concern, but with favorable weather and the supply of cars not curtailed by transportation companies the shipment for the present month is expected to exceed that of last month by many cars.

BORING FOR OIL AND GAS WILL SOON BEGIN

Contract for Sinking the Well Was Let Saturday to An Ohio Firm of Drillers.

At a meeting of the Yough River Oil and Gas Company held on last Saturday afternoon at the office of Mr. E. H. Sincell in Oakland a contract was made with the firm of Galbraith & Hewitt of Columbus, Ohio, to sink the first well for the local company, operations to begin as soon as the derrick can be erected and the machinery put upon the ground.

At the meeting above referred to a committee composed of Mr. J. W. Alderton, general manager, and Mr. Chauncey Kimmell, vice president of the company, was selected to look over the ground under lease and locate the place where the well is to be drilled. These two gentlemen on Monday made an exhaustive survey of the land and decided that the most likely spot where the product may be found is located on the farm of Mr. John Harned, a mile northeast of Hutton. The place selected is but a hundred yards north of Mr. Harned's residence and here the stake will be driven on Saturday morning at eleven o'clock when those interested in the well and the success of the undertaking are invited by Mr. Alderton and Mr. Kimmell to be present.

Ministerial Association at Friendsville

At the March meeting of the Ministerial Association of Friendsville the following officers were elected for the ensuing term: President, Rev. D. A. Friend; vice president, Rev. A. L. Donachy; secretary, Rev. H. C. Salem; treasurer, Rev. W. M. Lister.

At the meeting many matters of business were discussed and each pastor gave an interesting account of their Sunday services.

Plans are under way for a public meeting to be held in one of the churches when papers of special interest to laymen will be read by different ministers.

The April meeting of the Association will be held at the residence of Rev. D. A. Friend.

Trustees Sell Land.

Messrs. Fred. A. Thayer, William R. Offutt and Julius C. Renninger, trustees, have sold to Atha B. Johnson at private sale the Cornelius Johnson farm located near Sines, the consideration being $325.

Plans Have Been Received

The plans for the new court house to be erected in Oakland, have been received here and are on file at the office of the Board of County Commissioners where they may be seen by all intending bidders for the erection of the building.

SERMON PREACHED AT THE FUNERAL OF TRUMAN ROOT.

Delivered at Friendsville by Rev. A. L. Donachy of that Town.

[The following sermon, delivered by Rev. A. L. Donachy, upon the occasion of the funeral of Truman Root, who was murdered near Friendsville Feb. 14th, is published at the request of the Ministerial Association of Friendsville.—Ed. REPUBLICAN.]

My friends, it is a sad mission that has called so many of us to this house today. We are here to perform the last service we can render to our fellowman in this world.

In this casket before us lies the mortal remains of one well known to all who are here today; one whom I counted among my friends; one who I had for a long time felt an interest in, but today he sleeps the "dreamless sleep which knows no waking" until the Day of Judgment. God is infinite in mercy and we know that if this man called on Him for mercy in the hour of his extremity that pardon was granted. Presuming on God's mercy is our only consolation.

Truman Root died the night of February 14th, 1907, aged about 46 years.

The portion of Scripture we select on which to base our remarks, for this occasion you will find in Proverbs, 23rd chapter, beginning with the last clause of the 27th verse and ending with the 32nd verse.

We cannot pronounce an eulogy over the remains of our friend, but oh how we wish we could do so. We can only try to draw out of this sad affair (which has brought so much sorrow into so many homes and lives in our little community) some lesson that may help us in the future to more faithfully discharge our duties as citizens and Christians. Nothing which I can say here today will add to the grief of this heart-broken widow and mother, these seven fatherless children and these sorrowing sisters. So, we do not propose to mince our words on this sad occasion.

In philosophy we reason from cause to effect and from effect to cause. We want to, if we can, find out what was the cause of all this trouble which has so stirred the feelings of the people; which has brought this great congregation into this church house today; which has brought to so sad and untimely an end the life of the man who lies so silent before us; why I have as a minister of the Gospel twice in less than two months stood beside the casket containing the remains of men whom I counted as among my friends, with whom and for whom I had often poured out my soul in prayer to God, when they in sorrow and penitence were trying to shake off the fetters of intemperance which held them captive.

Solomon, wisest of all philosophers, links the strange women and wine together, as you will see in the text, as two great evils, and they are the greatest evils in the world today, as they ever have been, either one of itself capable of wrecking the lives, the happiness and the souls of men.

It seems to me that the arch ruler of hades must have exhausted the powers of his inventive genius when he devised the combination of the strange women and intoxicating drinks, for they are now as they ever have been his most powerful agencies for the destruction of human happiness and immortal souls.

Some of you have said that the strange woman was the cause of the trouble now under consideration, but she was only the secondary cause, the first or primary cause was the liquor and the licensed saloon.

We do not intend to be personal in our remarks, do not wish to hurt the feelings of any one in this congregation who is engaged in the liquor business. You have all treated me with kindness, and you have many good qualities, but as an humble minister of "The Gospel of Chrlst" I cannot be true to God and myself if I do not condemn your business. I admit it is a legitimate business, for the laws of the State and National government give you the right to engage in it, but it is wrong in the sight of God, wrong as a social or economical policy. That Nation or State is pursuing a suicidal policy which gives to one class of its citizens the right to engage in a business which is destructive to the prosperity, the health, the happiness, the homes and the lives of other classes of its citizens, and surely the liquor business does all of these.

I lived in Friendsville for a period of nearly five years, during which time we had no licensed saloons, and our village was a nice, quiet place in which to live. During that time there were no murders committed in our town, we had no policeman, we had no lock-up. We did not need them; but oh what change has taken place. We now have policeman and lock-up, and we need them both all the time. What has made the change? Simply this: We have the licensed saloon. We have had it for less than three years, but ah, what a record.

Two horrible tragedies in less than a year. Two men hurried out of time into eternity so quickly they scarce had time to say "God be merciful to me a sinner," wives made widows, children made fatherless, men with their hands stained with the blood of their fellowmen, many of our friends and neighbors, both old and young, pursuing the same course that brought this man to his untimely end. What assurance have you, my friends, that your end will not be as sad as was his?

Oh! the accursed traffic! What misery! What woe it brings in its train! Had I the power to banish it from the face of the land, even though it cost a million of lives to do it, I would gladly do so, for the price, even at that, would be low, for at least a million of lives are sacrificed to it every ten years, to say nothing about the physical and mental suffering brought upon helpless women and children.

Ten thousand murders committed in the United States during the year 1906, at least nine thousand directly chargable to liquor; prisons and insane asylums overflowing with prisoners and patients brought to their doors by drink. But one of the saddest things connected with the business in our town is this: If all who profess to be followers of Him who died for us, (who was the gift of God, great love for man,) and who live within the corporate limits had cast their votes against instead of for the license, as many did, these fracasses would not have occurred in our town.

Sometime the Great Judge of the quick and the dead will come and we will have to give an account of our stewardship. Brethren, how will you explain these actions to Him? Oh, I fear you "will call on the rocks and hills to fall on you and hide you from His face," unless you repent of these acts.

God speed the day when the church shall rise in righteous indignation and shake off the coils of the serpent, the saloon, which is stinging this nation like an adder. Then will nine-tenths of the sin, misery and woe which now rests upon this Nation like a pall fall away.

"How long, Oh Lord, how long must we endure?"

RESIGNED AS PASTOR.

Rev. John A. McClelland Severed His Connection With Oakland Congregation.

At a congregational meeting of the Oakland Presbyterian church held on last Sunday morning, Rev. John A. McClelland, who has been the pastor for the past two years or more, tendered his resignation to take effect upon the assembling of the Presbytery which meets next week.

It is rumored that Mr. McClelland resigned the pastorate here in order to accept a call tendered him by the Grafton Presbyterian church at Grafton, W. Va.

Historical Editions of the "Book of the Royal Blue."

The last three numbers of this pleasing little magazine contain a number of historical sketches relative to Jamestown, Yorktown and Williamsburg, Virginia, and Washington, D. C., especially prepared in advance of the Jamestown Celebration in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of English speaking people in America.

The January number tells of the celebration in detail with illustrated description of the Exposition buildings and grounds, with birds-eye view of Hampton Roads as it will appear with the magnificient Naval Display. A large map shows locations of the battlefields and principal historical places which may be visited in connection with the Exposition.

The February number treats almost exclusively of Washington in connection with the Jamestown Exposition, with a most interesting write-up of the National Capital, fully illustrated. This is most appropos, as the majority of visitors going to Jamestown will desire to take advantage of the stopover privilege at Washington enroute to and from the Exposition.

The March number is dedicated to Virginia, and graphically tells the story of the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown and gives a most complete history of Williamsburg where the first legislative body in America was convened.

As reference books in schools, these three numbers are valuable. They can be had from the Passenger Department of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad at Baltimore by mailing the requisite postage, five cents for each copy.

Mrs. Amanda Hyde, who has been the guest of Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Teats during the past winter, left Oakland for Connellsville, Pa., yesterday morning. She was accompanied as far as Cumberlann by her son Mr. F. G. Hyde, the latter returning to Oakland last night.

NEW CITY COUNCIL ORGANIZED MONDAY NIGHT.

Mr. J. M. Stanton Made President, Succeeding Mr. Joseph E. Harned.

The newly elected members of the City Council, Messrs. William G. Hinebaugh, Harry W. Helbig and James H. Painter, met with the hold-over members of that body—Messrs. Joseph E. Harned, Charles Liller and J. M. Stanton—on last Monday night when the Council reorganized with the election of Mr. Stanton as President.

Mr. Joseph E. Harned, who retired from the presidency of that body, made an excellent record as presiding officer during the past year, when the public business was despatched with alacrity and at the same time intelligently. His removal as such was made upon political grounds, he being now the only Republican member of the Council.

Mr. John C. Dunham, who has served as Clerk for many years, a Republican, was retained in his capacity as such.

Under the provisions of the charter Council elects, in addition to its clerk, the treasurer, tax collector, street commissioner and weighmaster, while the Mayor is empowered to appoint policemen, city attorney and police magistrate.

The Mayor submitted his appointments to Council which were confirmed as follows:

Attorney, William R. Offutt.
Police Magistrate, Mr. A. B. Gonder.
Policemen, William Newman and Joseph White.
Council elected—
Treasurer, Mr. John W. Hart.
Tax Collector, Mr. D. M. Mason.
Street Commissioner, Mr. A. C. Wotring.

The position of weighmaster was left vacant for the present.

After transacting routine business Council adjourned.

A janitor in a neighboring school threw up his job the other day. When asked what was the trouble, he said, "I'm honest and I won't stand being slurred. If I find a pencil or a handkerchief 'bout the school I hang it up. Every little while the teacher or some one that is too cowardly to face me gives me a slur." "In what way?" asked ths officer. "Why, a little while ago I saw written on the board, 'find the common multiple.' Well, I looked from cellar to garret, and I wouldn't know the thing if I met it on the street. What made me quit my job? Last night in big writin' on the blackboard, it said, 'find the greatest common divisor.' Well, I says to myself, both of them darn things are lost now, and I'll be blamed for swipin' 'em, so I'll quit."

TWENTY DIVORCES AN HOUR GRANTED.

Decree Granted Every Three Minutes In the United States.

During working hours of court officials there is a divorce suit filed every two minutes and a divorce granted every three minutes in the United States, according to figures compiled by the Census Bureau. This has been the average for the past twenty years, and sensus officials say the average is increasing at an alarming rate.

For the twenty year period from 1867 to 1887 there were only 328,000 divorce suits filed in this country. For the twenty-year period from 1887 to 1907 the number aggregates 1,400,000 or more than four times the number for the first period. Experts figure it that for the twenty-year period prior to 1887 there were 33 divorces for every 100,000 inhabitants, while for the twenty-year period from 1887 to 1907 there were 70 divorces for every 100,000 population. Decrees of divorce are issued in about two-thirds of the suits filed.

"The astonishing thing developed by the investigation now being made by the Census Bureau," said an official, "is that the greatest increase in divorce is in the rural districts. I do not mean by this that the rural districts furnish the most divorce cases. The cities still do that. But the increase in cities for the last twenty-year period over the period from 1867 to 1887 is not as large as the increase in the rural districts. We are now trying to find out the cause of the increase, both in city and country."

The bureau has 100 agents in the field now, gathering divorce statistics. It is getting such details, such as the cause of the proceedings, whether husband or wife filed suit, whether suit was contested, number of years parties were married, number of children, whether alimony was paid, and if intemperance was either the direct or indirect cause.

An aggressive business policy on the part of our business men, reaching out for everything within reach, encouraging all would-be comers, expending money when a two-fold return is reasonably certain, it would seem is one of the ways to best build up a city. A town is what its people make it. It may slowly grow by the little accretions that accidentally fall within its influence, or it can be pushed into vigorous and rapid growth by the aggressive activity of its business element. The United States, although the youngest among nations, manufactures more goods, sells more merchandise, raises more produce, employs more labor, pays more wages, gives more happy and prosperous homes than any nation on earth.

The International Sunday School Lesson.

Second Quarter. Lesson I. Genesis xxviii, 1-5, 10-22. April 7, 1907.

Copyright, Davis W. Clark.

Jacob's Vision and God's Promise.

Esau's prowess could easily undo Jacob's plotting. Mother and son seem not to have duly appreciated the risk of exciting the rage of the hunter used to striking deadly blows. The Edomite, like another elder brother, and with more cause than he, was at once inflamed with murderous enmity. The mother's wit was not long in scenting the danger, and she bade her favorite fly. . . . Jacob was heir apparent to the chieftainship of a tribe growing with phenomenal rapidity; the successor of a vast Oriental estate; but he must needs take his departure in the most ignominious plight; no caravan or escort; not so much as a single servant; nothing but the stick in his hand. Out he goes, a shelterless fugitive, a tramp, with four hundred and fifty miles and forty years of exile ahead of him. The odds seem against him; for he has been enervated by tent-life, while his pursuer is used to chasing game. One can not but contrast the grandson's sorry exit with the grandfather's happy and stately entrance to the land. . . . The man who was so used to the sweets of domesticity was getting further and further from home, his sorrows inceasing all the way. He must needs keep far from the dwellings of men. He starts at every sight and sound. Bitter are his tears, fervent his prayers. But the Lord delays his coming, as He did to His disciples, storm-tossed on Gennesaret. For two nights, probably, the fugitive must lie down in the gloaming uncomforted. . . . On the evening of the third day (probably) Jacob lighted on (literally) the place—likely one of his grandfather's camping places. The very sight of the altar may have strengthened his faith. Doubtless he began there the wrestling which made him Israel forty years later at the Jabbok. The kingdom of heaven suffered violence that night, as Jacob laid his head on a stone from Abraham's altar. . . . The last object left on the dimming vision of the patriarch may have been the jagged staircase, the receding rocky ledges opposite, and faintly revealed in the starlight. In his dream the steps rise to heaven, are illuminated by an unearthly radiance, and peopled by angel forms. But all this is but by way of approach to the ineffable person of Jehovah, who stands above it. . . . The mere vision would have been indescribably comforting, but the spoken word is added. The fugitive is assured that the very ground on which he lies he shall possess; and that his progeny shall be so numerous that they can not be confined in narrow limits, but shall break out toward the four points of the compass. Jehovah's protective company is assured. . . . Jacob, on waking, cries: "Jehovah was here, though I had forfeited all claim upon Him, and had no right to expect His coming." A holy awe fills the dreamer's soul. He cries again: "Why, this lonely place proved the very portal to Jehovah's palace! . . . He converts his pillow into a pillar, and makes an oblation upon it from his scanty cruse. He names the place "House of God." He enters into a sacred treaty of reciprocity: "Since God has made his assuring promises, I will make mine. This spot shall be a permanent places of worship, and I will tithe my income."

Analysis and Key.

1. Possibility and danger of Esau's rage overlooked.
   Mother advises flight.
2. Jacob's exit in contrast to Abraham's entrance.
3. Jacob's fears and loneliness.
4. Camps on the third night at "The Place."
   Site of Abraham's altar (probably).
   Religious impressions of place.
   Faith and prayer.
5. Last object on Jacob's closing eyes.
   Jagged staircase of receding rocky ledges.
   The ladder of the dream.
6. Jehovah: protective company assured by dream.
7. Jacob's gratitude.
   Sign of pillar and oblation.
   Promise of dedication of site and tithing of income.

The Teacher's Lantern.

The story of Jacob puts no premium on craft in the management of one's affairs. "The Lord used Jacob for holy purposes"—yes; but in spite of his despicable conduct, not because of it. The seal of Divine disapproval is clearly affixed. Those who think chicane—a little of it, at least—indispensable to success, find no comfort or justification in this instance.

* * * * *

Jacob was terribly punished. He was separated forever from his doting mother, was exiled forty years; got paid back in his own coin, with compounded interest. As he practiced a fraud to get a blessing, so Laban practice one on him to withhold the woman he loved. The way of the transgressor is hard.

* * * * *

Great are the advantages of solitude. If Jacob had pushed on into the town of Luz, chances are he never would have seen the ladder. Our age needs more chance to meditate. The pendulum has swung to the opposite of mediæval anchoretism. Quaintly and well does George Herbert say:

"Choose sometime to be alone Salute thyself!"

* * * * *

The stoniness of Jacob's pillow had better not be unduly emphasized. It was not an unusual hardship then, nor to this day, in the East. William Taylor, missionary bishop to Africa, carried a stone in his satchel. It had a notch in it as if artificially made just to conform to a human head. The bishop was wont to supplant feather pillows with his stone, and affirmed that it drew the heat from the head and superinduced to sleep.

* * * * *

Be careful not to make the ladder of the vision serve too many purposes. Jesus in His conversation with Nathanael makes it the symbol of His Mediatorial work, which spans the chasm between God and man, and makes intercommunication possible. That is enough. (John i, 51.)

* * * * *

The pillar reared and anointed may stand for the use of form in religion. Constituted as we are, the employment of religious ceremony is indispensible. Some one says the forms of religion are like a ladder. The vitally religious man uses the ladder to reach a greater altitude. The formalist just keeps running up and down it to exhibit his agility.

* * * * *

Alms and prayers are inseparable. Jacob evinced his sincerity by pouring one-tenth of the oil in his cruse upon the memorial he had set up. This required faith; for the oil seemed indispensable for the comfort of his long journey. The Divine claim is small. God takes the earnings of one finger, and lets us keep that of the other nine.

* * * * *

Once in childhood, far from home, I was taken by a person I did not know to a strange house. The loneliness was almost insufferable; but just as we entered the hallway I glanced up the staircase, and there on the landing stood my father, smiling at me. The whole situation was changed in an instant. That is but a faint suggestion of how the sight of the Heavenly Father, standing at the head of the staircase of the dream, must have banished Jacob's loneliness and reassured him.

* * * * *

Events and persons cluster about Bethel like filings about a magnet. Here Abraham had a tent and God had an altar. (Gen. xii, 8.) Here Abraham showed his generous spirit in allowing Lot first choice in the partition of the land, and Lot his uncanny greed in taking the best portion (xiii). Here Jacob dreamed (xxviii, 19) and made oblation (xxxv, 14, 15). It was the depository of the ark, and there was an altar there to which the people generally resorted. (Judges xx, 19.) It was one of the holy cities to which Samuel resorted as circuit judge. (1 Sam. vii, 16.) Elijah (2 Kings ii, 23), Elisha (2 Kings ii, 23-25), Jehu (2 Kings x, 29), are associated with it. Among the prophets, Amos (v, 14-22) and Hosea (xii, 4, 5) refer to it.

* * * * *

A foul blot is on the fair record of this ancient place. Almost continuously with the pure worship of Jehovah at this place runs the worship of local divinities, until Jeroboam makes calf-worship the State religion of the Northern Kingdom. (1 Kings xii, 28.)

* * * * *

Strange that a place so conspicuous of the Old Testament is not so much as mentioned in the New. Yet Jesus and the apostles must have been often in this locality.

* * * * *

Probable that the name Bethel was used with a religious significance before Jacob applied it to this site. It certainly continues in the same significance; as for example the chief sanctury of the Mohammedan world, the Beithallah of Mecca.

* * * * *

Jewish tradition says that the stone Jacob set up at Bethel was removed to the second temple and used as the pedestal of the Ark of the Covenant. It is supposed to have survived the destruction of the Romans.

* * * * *

The ruins of Bethel cover four acres, and consist of very many foundations and half-standing walls. Eastward is a hill covered by the most perfect heap of ruins to be seen even in this country of ruins. This is oft-mentioned Ai.

APRIL SHOWERS

Combined With Electrical Displays Will Be Part of Coming Weather.

P. R. Smith, of Kingwood, hands in the following forecast for April:

April is likely to have a number of dashing showers of rain attended by electricity. Auroras or northern lights will show up during the spring and summer with much brilliancy. Also haloes—beautiful circles or rings—will make their appearance around the sun berore and after rains, and sunsets of much beauty will be natural. Saturn will be in his equinox on the 16th of April.

This same astronomical condition took place on July 16, 1892, the atmosphere and the earth then being so impregnated with electricity that telegraphic instruments failed to communicate messages as far south as Pittsburg, Pa. In Boston, Portland, Me., and the cities of Canada all telegraphic machinery remained idle 12 hours or more.

The storm wave starting near the close of March may run into the 1st or 2d of April before its force is expended. Belated sleet and snow may show up in northern parts, and even in central sections. Frost and a cool wave will follow.

On or about the 6th and 7th the temperature will become warm and be followed by April rains; then it will turn much cooler.

On the 12th it will change to warmer and be followed by rain. At the close of this period look for frost about the mornings of the 14th, 16th and 16th.

From the 19th to the 21st or 22d will be a rainy period attended in some parts by intense gales of wind. At its close frost will appear on the 22d and 23d.

The 25th and 26th will bring on more storm disturbance and cloudiness may continue into the next pertod.

The last storm period will be central on the 28th. Most sections of this country will be visited by intense showers of rain, wind and electrical displays, then followed on the close of the month by a very cool wave and frost.

DER GERMAN COBBLER

Hans Sees Both Sides of Life While Attending to Business.

SORROWFUL MAN VISITS HIM.

Gets a Cold Reception From the Little German Shoemaker and Proceeds to Make It Hot For Him—Old Man Snyder Calls For a Chat.

[Copyright, 1907, by C. H. Sutcliffe.]

I vhas in my shop mit a cement patch on a shoe for feefteen cents vhen a tall, sad looking man comes in und says:

"Cobbler, do you haf some rope around here to gif me to hang myself?"

"Not today," I says.

"Haf you got some poison?"

"Only one pound, und I keep dot for cats."

"Vhill you please put a knife in my heart or hit me on der head mit an ax?"

"I vhas too busy."

"Ah, dot vhas der vhay of der world—always too busy to care for der sorrows of others! Vhas it something to you dot I married a womans who won't take in washing to support me?"

"No."

"Do you care if my house vhas wretchedness und my days und nights vhas full of woe?"

"No."

"My wife pulls my hair und chokes me, und she drives me oudt into der cold world to find some jobs of carrying in coal. Vhen I get oop in der mornings I vhas sorrowful, und vhen I lie down at night I vhas afraid. It vhas all sorrow, sorrow, sorrow, but do you care a continental cocked hat?"

"I don't pellef I do," I says.

"No, of course not. You vhas a happy man und a bloated aristocrat. You can haf country sausage eafery day for dinner und walk oudt mit your cane, und you don't care for poor peoples. I make you care, however. Dootchmans, look oudt for yourself!"

"GET OOP LIVELY!"

He Was Badly Damaged.

Mit dot he shumps at me und chokes me und rolls me on der floor, und vhen he goes avhay I vhas damaged until my head swims und der shop goes round und round. I haf to smell some camphor und put a rag around my head before I go to work again.

Maype it vhas one pefore der old man Snyder comes in. He vhas some Dootchmans, too, but he makes me tired. He sits down und shmokes his pipe und don't say one word for forty minutes py some clocks. Den he speaks oudt:

"Hans, how vhas it aboudt some trusts?"

"I don't keep 'em on hand," I says.

"Don't try to be funny. You haf heard of trusts. It vhas trusts who put oop der prices of meat, leather, coal und lots of tings."

"Vhell?"

"Vhell, you know I vhas der only man for ten blocks around dot makes frankfurters. Peoples who half to buy must come to me. I keep der price so much all der time. A week ago my wife wakes oop in der night und says to me:

"'Snyder, you vhas a fool!'

"'How vhas dot?' I says as I wake oop too.

"'Because you don't make one hoondered per cent profit on sausages.'

"'But how can I?'

"'You shall become a trust und put prices oop. Der peoples must haf frankfurters, und dey must come to you. If you vhas a smart man you vhas reech in vone year.'

"Vhell, dot makes me do some tinking," says Snyder. "I sit und tink und scratch my head, und I stand oop und tink und feel of my ear, und in two days I vhas a trust, und prices vhas oop. I vhas a trust for two days, und den I vhas busted."

"How vhas it?" I says.

"Shust like dis. I drink a keg of beer eafery week. My beer vhas oudt one day, und I goes by der brewery und says:

"'Schmidt, you may send me oop dot keg of beer for a dollar und a half.'

"'I don't haf some,' he says.

"'But vhy?'

Beer and Frankfurters.

"'Because she haf gone oop to 14 shillings. Beer vhas in sympathy mit frankfurters, you know. Ven one goes oop, der odder goes oop too.'

"Dot knocks me oudt, but I haf to pay. Dot same day I goes by der tailor who cleans my clothes und says, 'How mooch to clean my coat?' He says it vhas feefteen cents more ash before because frankfurters vhas gone oop, und coats vhas in sympathy. I go by der coal man for a ton of coal, but it vhas gone oop a quarter on a ton to me. I goes by der butcher for my meat, but meat vhas higher. It vhas so in eafery place, und I bust oop my trust und go home und say to my wife:

"'If I make $4 ash a trust und lose $6 ash an individual, how many fools vhas in our family?'

"I like Mr. Snyder to go home, because I shall send oudt der growler for beer und drink by myself, but he smokes und smokes und stays on, und by und by he says:

"'Hans, maype I do some awful tings last night, und I vhas feeling bad aboudt it.'

"'Do you rob somepody?' I says.

"'No, not dot. I used to haf a brudder-in-law named Carl. He vhas a fine man, und he reads und tinks a great deal. He don't belief he shall go to heaven vhen he dies, but dot he vhill turn into some animal und stay on earth. I laugh at him many times, but he vhas werry serious. Maype you remember dot he dies last spring? He shumps off a street car und falls on his head und breaks his neck. You could take his face und turn it clear around und make him look backward.'

"Yes, I hear aboudt it."

On His Guard.

"Vhell, I can't say if he turns into some animal, but all der time I vhas looking oudt for him. Maype he vhas a horse or a dog or a cat. Last night I comes home late und finds a dog in my westibule. Maype I haf too mooch beer und vhas mad. Ash soon ash I see dot dog I shump on him und kick him down der steps, und I no sooner tell my wife about it dan she throws oop her arms und cries oudt:

"'Oh, cruel man, vhat haf you done? Dot poor dog vhas my poor brudder Carl come to us for food und lodgings.'

"I run oudt und whistle und call und look all aroundt, but der dog can't be found. He vhas afraid I kick him some more. Hans, do you pellef dot vhas my brudder-in-law?'

"I can't say, but if I vhas him I bite you vhen you kick."

"I wish he had. I wish I vhas too drunk to kick him. Poor Carl! He comes home for supper und to bed, und he meets mit a kick und cusswords. I don't pellef I can ever forgif myself."

Snyder Sheds Tears.

Mr. Snyder turns his head avhay und sheds tears, but I can't say nottings to comfort him. In der first place, I vhas too busy mit dot half sole, und in der next maype dot dog vhas somepody else's brudder-in-law und goes by der wrong house. Nopody speaks for ten minutes, und den Mr. Snyder wipes avhay der tears und says:

"Hans, did you hear aboudt me und der street car conductor?"

"I don't pellef so."

"Vhell, I make complaint against him at headquarters. I take a street car der odder day to go to Greenfield. I don't know where it is, und I tell der conductor to let me off. Dot car goes on und on, und it vhas one hour pefore I says:

"'Don't we come to Greenfield yet?'

"'Vhy, man, we vhas six miles beyond it?' he says.

"'But I wanted to get off at Greenfield.'

"'You must be mistook. Greenfield vhas all right in der summer, but now dot it vhas winter you want to get off at Snow Hill.'"

"Und dot vhas not all, Hans. Vhen I goes to get off der car he calls oudt, 'Step lively!' Dot makes me fall down, und he calls oudt, 'Get oop lively!' I gets oop und starts avhay, und he shouts after me, 'Limp lively!' und eaferybody laughs und makes me feel bad. I make complaint und haf him bounced oudt. It vhas all right to be lively, but you must not be too lively. Vhat did you say, Hans?"

I don't say nottings, und while I vhas saying it und keeping still Mr. Snyder falls asleep und don't wake oop till all der beer vhas vanished und some ice water vhas in der pail.

She Pinned a Rose on Me.

She sweetly bit the stem off short
And pinned a rose on me;
She had to slightly raise her head,
For she was small, you see,
And we were all alone just then.
She sweetly bit the stem off short
And pinned a rose on me.

I pressed my lips upon her lips,
And love o'erflowed my eyes.
She did not say, "How dare you, sir?"
But heaved soft, happy sighs.
She was my mother, sweetheart, all.
I pressed my lips upon her lips,
And love filled full our eyes.

NEW STRAWBERRIES.

Two Are Immense Croppers and Strong Growing Plants.

Greater progress has been made the last three or four years along the strawberry line than ever before. The Sample is about the only variety that holds its own, but from present indications even that berry will be set one side. The Cardinal, a pistillate variety like the Sample, just now is creating quite a sensation. The illustration here shown was taken from a cluster of last season and is a correct likeness of the berry, not one of those overgrown berries, but will average good size, an immense cropper and the most vigorous growing plant ever sent out. It will be a mortgage lifter, says an eastern grower in American Cultivator. Golden Gate is another new berry of great promise. This is a fancy berry, like the Marshall, only it is worth a dozen of it, being of fine quality and a good cropper.

THE CARDINAL STRAWBERRY.

The Abington, sent out two years ago, has proved about what the originator claimed and is a safe berry to plant.

Another berry, the Dicky, that has not been put upon the market yet is a strong, staminate variety, an immense cropper, very firm, colors well and is a long season berry. I have no plants of it on my grounds, but as soon as I can I shall set largely of it.

Field Dodder.

Dodder, or love vine, is a great enemy of alfalfa. It is a parasitic vine growing on the stems and taking out the life and vitality of even the roots. The vine intwines itself about the alfalfa stems in great clusters and grows luxuriantly or small in exact proportion to the growth of alfalfa. When the alfalfa is cut, this vine appears in dry, hairy bunches about the stems. It is so repugnant to horses and cattle that it will not be eaten except as a last resort before starvation. The best way to keep free from dodder is to buy only clean seed. In some cases farmers use fanning mills and try to reclean the seed before sowing. If the plant gets started in a field, the best plan to get rid of it is to scatter straw over the alfalfa stubble and burn the entire field. This does not injure the alfalfa, but kills the dodder and other noxious weeds.—Kimball's Dairy Farmer.

Hen Manure For Crops.

Hen manure gives good results on all crops, but probably best on such plants as make most of their growth above ground, like cabbage, corn or grass. Some great results, however, are reported with hen manure on potatoes. We generally use it on garden crops and strawberries. The most effective use of this manure is, as we have often described, to crush it fine and mix with chemicals, such as muriate of potash and acid phosphate. This makes a fair mixture for many crops. The hen manure is richer in nitrogen than in potash and phosphoric acid, and these chemicals give it a good "balance."—Rural New Yorker.

Injurious to Trees.

The most effective insecticide yet employed against the oyster shell bark louse during the dormant period of the tree is the lime sulphur, or lime sulphur salt wash. An application of this wash during the latter part of March or first weeks in April, followed in the case of badly infested trees by a second application before the buds have swollen much, will generally suffice to eradicate the scale. Such treatment is also effective in destroying the apple scab fungous spores. The oyster shell bark louse is readily distinguishable from other scale insects by its elongated, rather slender curved form, being about one-eighth inch in length. —Joseph L. Hills, Vermont.

OYSTER SHELL BARK LOUSE.

Orchards In Grass.

The majority of good apple orchards nowadays are in cultivation. The old fashioned plan of seeding the orchard down to grass is in disfavor. Still there are some exceptional cases in which apples do fairly well or even better than that while growing in sod. —F. A. Waugh in Gardening.

THE PRESIDENT'S RESPONSE.

The President has formally declined to make a speech before the Illinois Manufacturers' Association defining more fully than he has already done his attitude toward the railroads. He calls attention to his speeches and messages delivered within the past two years upon one phase or another of the subject of railroad management and control, and in an explanatory letter written to the chairman of the Illinois association he remarks that these speeches and messages embody all that he would have to say if he spoke now.

In the opening of the Raleigh speech, to which Mr. Roosevelt directs attention, he declares: "I do not believe in government ownership of anything which can, with propriety, be left in private hands, and, in particular, I should most strenuously object to government ownership of railroads." He follows this declaration up, however, by making perfectly plain the distinction which he draws between government ownership and government control of the railroads. He is just as positive in declaring that they should be controlled as he is in his expression of belief that they should not be owned. It is a "supervisory and regulatory right over the railroads" for which he contends, and, in this connection, he asserts that "actual experience has shown that it is not possible to leave the railroads uncontrolled." In this breif summary Mr. Roosevelt's often defined and generally understood attitude upon the railroad issues that have recently been under general discussion is stated. As he himself intimates, it would scarcely be worth while to make a special speech in order to say the same things over again.

But it is a reasonable assumption that those who have been urging the President to deliver some message to the general public that would serve to allay the feeling of apprehension that has followed the recent marked decline in prices of railroad and industrial securities did not expect of him that he should repudiate any of his expressed views concerning the degree of governmental regulation to which the railroad should be subjected. Judging from the purport of a recently published paper by Mr. Harriman, the President and that railroad magnate are not so very far apart on the questions of government regulation Indeed, it seems that Mr. Harriman has conceded to the justness of pretty much all for which Mr. Roosevelt contends.

What the President has been urged to do, it is generally understood, was that he should make some formal utterance that would aid in restoring confidence in the general railroad and business situation. Possibly his brief letter calling attention to his previous utterances may have some such effect. It is not simply the "immediate situation in Wall Street" that is involved, but the far-reaching and intricate situation that embraces all the industries of the country that may eventually be affected if unreasonable fears continue to dominate. Whether panicky conditions originate in speculative plunging or otherwise, there is danger always that the ultimate results will not distinguish between the speculative and nonspeculative enterprises.

Why Do Country Boys Flock to Big Cities?

Most small towns are short of young men. As a rule there are plenty of agreeable girls who would not object to matrimony; there are plenty of old people and enough babies to go around. But the boy—oh, where is he?

The boy, the young man, has gone to the city, where he imagines there are opportunities. To him the old home town is dull and stupid. He sees no future for himself there. Both for social and financial considerations he rushes off to the great city. Very frequently he finds that he is lonesomer there than at home—nearly always so; and even more frequently he finds that riches do not grow on ten story walls.

BUT STILL HE GOES TO THE CITY.

In going there the boy simply follows his daddy's dollars. For years his daddy and his mother and his big sister and his Aunt Mary Ann have been mailing their money to the big city for Mail Order bargains.

Result: Home merchants don't thrive, grass grows in the streets, no jobs are to be had, no opening for a new business, and the young man goes to the city because it is a place where people have traded at home and built up their own community and provided opportunities for outsiders as well as for themselves.

IF YOU WANT TO KEEP YOUR BOY AT HOME BUILD UP YOUR TOWN SO THAT HE CAN BUILD UP HIS CAREER AMONG HIS HOME FOLKS.

THE MAIL ORDER HOUSE.

Many mail order houses do a large business, but the reason therefor is no secret. You can't pick out one that is not an ardent believer in and user of printers ink. The catalogues sent out pleases because the one responsible for them studies the art. He gets a picture of the article to be sold before the prospective buyer—and he purchases it because he sees the picture and the price, needs the article and doesn't know he can get it at the local merchant—and another dollar, hard-earned, has been withdrawn from circulation in the community that needs it so much. Pictures appeal to the eye when cold type fails. An illustrated advertisement is the one that does most good—is the best drawer. The merchants of whole communities fight the mail order house with the very weapons selected by the mail order house for them—empty words. They condemn the mail order house and deplore the fact that many dollars go away from their towns for goods which could be bought at home at a saving to the consumer. They attempt to frighten with a scarecrow.

We take [illegible]er premise when we say tha[illegible]e farmer and those who li[illegible] a small town do not patron[illegible]e the mail order house because they like to, but because they think they can be better served by it than by the home merchant. Of course we know this is an error because some of us who live in the towns are in the stores every day and know the stock carried. But many people do not. The mail order house is intrenched in the minds of the people by a lavish use of printer's ink, the force that moves the world, and too many of the home merchants are not. Don't the remedy suggest itself?

The local newspaper can talk until its black in the face and its toe nails come off, but until the local merchant, generally, learns the value of printer's ink, and its proper application, more or less money will go from every community to the mail order house.

Oakland merchants are awake, alive and energetic, and not much goes by them to the mail order house, for they appreciate what publicity does for them and keep everlastingty at it.

GETTING INTERESTING.

When Senator Foraker threw down the challenge for a primary election in Ohio relative to the candidacy of himself and Secretary Taft for the Presidency, thinking that if perchance he should lose in the race for the big plum he would still remain Senator, he was not aware that his challenge would be accepted. But it has been and it has been made broader than the Senator may desire. Charles P. Taft, editor of the Cincinnati Times-Star and brother of Secretary Taft, has issued a card stating that the Taft adherents are willing to put the matter to a square test with no second honors. Let the people vote their preference as between Foraker and Taft and whoever is beaten is to retire from the field and not be considered as a candidate for any other office. Under this arrangement if Taft wins, Foraker stands eliminated from the Ohio political situation; if Foraker wins the same holds as to Taft. It is now up to Foraker to accept or renege. Senator Foraker's position on the rate bill and his general hostility to President Roosevelt's administration will very likely put him out of the running in one of the most crushing defeats ever administered to sinful man. At least that is the way it looks. It will be interesting to watch the contest at a safe distance.

THE APPLE INTERESTS OF GARRETT COUNTY.

State Senator Brown Addressed a Letter to the Public Upon the Subject.

To the Editor of The Republican.

DEAR SIR:—As I feel confident that you are in sympathy with me in my efforts to improve the apple interests of our county, I take the liberty of asking that you will, through the columns of your paper once more bring before our people the importance and necessity that we should all unite in the production of a few kinds (only) of the best keeping, late or winter varieties of apples, in order that we may attract buyers to our farms and produce apples by the car load and not merely a few bushels of one kind, as is now usually the case. Not only is keeping necessary, but the quality must be good.

At the recent institute a popular vote was taken, and this showed that our leading apples were as follows: Baldwin, York Imperial, Northern Spy, Grimes Golden, King of Tompkins.

The grafting of nearly all of the summer apple trees in our orchards with one or more of these varieties cannot be too strongly urged; in this way we will soon increase the output of our farms, and the market now so illusive will come to us.

In setting out trees, plant one kind to the extent of at least one hundred trees.

Now is the time to cut good thrifty scions. If you have not got them, get them from a neighbor. After cutting them place them in the ground, partially covering them.

If you have not grafted yourself learn how to do so; or if not this then at once engage a good man to do it for you.

Trim your trees carefully, sawing the branches off close, and parallel to the trunk of the tree, and put some coal tar or paint over the wound. Graft near the body of the tree not way off at the ends of spreading branches. In three years, if your work is well done, and you have put in enough grafts, your trees, that are now practically worthless in producing a revenue will be yielding a handsome profit.

Fifty trees to an acre (i. e. 30 x 30 feet) should on an average when in good bearing produce 500 to 600 bushels, this being about 200 barrels, or a car load, and might be expected if well handled and cared for to produce $150 to $200 profit.

Yours truly,
W. McCULLOH BROWN.

Advance In Prices.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM MISS DAVIS

Young Globe Trotter Writes to Her Mother from Paris.

Miss Blanche Davis, of Wilkinsburg, Pa., who left Mountain Lake Park last fall with her uncle, Dr. Stone, of New York, for a tour of the world has written the following letter to her mother from Paris, France, and is published in these columns knowing that it will be interesting to our readers and to Miss Davis' friends in Oakland and at the Park:

PARIS, March 13, 1907.

MY DEAR MOTHER:—We have had a great time since we reached Europe. We landed at Naples Sunday, the third of March. We loafed around all day and went to church. On Monday Uncle Sumner, Marybai and I climbed Vesuvius and saw Pompeii. You've heard all about this but I'll tell you any how. We went about two thirds of the way up Vesuvius by trolley and then got horses. We rode up an awfully steep zig zag path, right up the cone. When we got nearly to the top of it we had to get off and walk. The ashes were soft and our feet sank down so our shoes were just filled with little lumps and fine gray dust. We didn't get much of a view after we did get up for it was very cloudy and the crater was filled with fog. We came down some distance and then took a path for Pompeii. We had to ride for about four miles over hardened lava and rocks and I can tell you it was not much of a joke. When we were about a mile from Pompeii a great storm came up and it rained furiously and we were thoroughly drenched. It was cold too but I didn't take a cold. Wet as we were we dragged our way through Pompeii. I had read "The Last Day of Pompeii" just before so that made it much more interesting. You can see the chariot ruts on the streets. Some of the paintings are almost perfect and everything seems so well preserved. We left Naples that night at midnight and arrived in Rome at six in the morning.

I can't tell you everything we did there but these are some of the things we saw: St. Peter's Cathedral, Vatican, (Sistine Chapel, Museum of Sculpture), Forum, Colosseum, St Paul's outside the Wall, St. John Lateran Scala Santa, the Catacombs,—just everything. We went to Florence, there we saw the art galleries and many things of interest. I'd like to spend a whole month in Florence, just going through the galleries. We saw all the great master pieces that you read about and see copies of. It is so interesting to watch the students copying the pictures. Some of the copies are very good.

We spent Sunday and Monday in Venice. It is a charming city. There is not much to see except San Narco Acadamy of Fine Arts, Doges Palace, the dungeons, the Bridge of Sighs, &c. On Monday morning we went down to the Plaza and fed the pigeons. They are just as dear as they can be. They come and sit on your hands and shoulders and seem perfectly at home.

How often I have read about things and how little I ever expected to see them, but yesterday capped the climax. We went to Geneva and spent all day there. It was cold and from the train we often saw snow. It was the first I had been near enough to touch since last winter. In the afternoon we took an incline train to the summit of a small mountain. When near our destination, the train was stopped by snow. Uncle Sumner, Marybai and I walked to the top. The snow was deep and sometimes the crust wouldn't hold me. May be it didn't remind me of home—but we never have lovely white snow like they do in Switzerland, I ate a whole lot of it. It was freezing cold, and the wind was fierce but the view we got of Mt. Blanc and the range of mountains was glorious. In the evening we went to John Calvin's church and home. They were interesting but the buildings are not specially attactive.

We have now been one day in Paris. I like it very much so far. We have a nice hotel and have good rooms. Its all very nice but of course there's no place like home.

BLANCHE.

Funeral of Mr. Brydon.

The funeral of Mr. William A. Brydon, whose death occurred at his home in Bloomington Wednesday afternoon last, took place Saturday afternoon upon the arrival of the Baltimore and Ohio train at Cumberland bearing his remains from his late home. The funeral procession from the Queen City depot was a long one, many friends accompanying the remains from Bloomington, attesting the high esteem in which the deceased was held by those with whom he had lived for so many years. In Cumberland there was a like evidence of respect shown the departed by those who had known him intimately. The body was taken to Emmanuel Episcopal church where impressive funeral services were held, Rev. William Cleveland Hicks, rector, officiating. Many beautiful floral offerings were banked about the casket as it rested at the chancel. The pallbearers were Dr. Z. T. Kalbaugh, Piedmont; Dr. H. M. Kemp, R. A. L. Howard, Bloomington; Carroll Patterson, O. H. Tibbetts, [illegible] Virginia Junction; D. H. Frey, Keyser, and Lloyd Roberts and J. B. G. Roberts, of Cumberland. Interment was made in Rose Hill cemetery.

Mr. Peter P. Lohr, of Oakland, left here Tuesday afternoon for Grantsville, to which point he was called by the illness of his sister, Mrs. Sarah A. Broadwater, widow of the late Jefferson Broadwater. Mrs. Broadwater is now nearly eighty years of age and her condition is considered extremely grave. Mrs. Peter P. Lohr has been at the bedside of her relative for the past week.

Mr. Mahlon Glotfelty, who was injured on his mill at McHenry last Wednesday afternoon, when he suffered the loss of his thumb, came up to Oakland Tuesday to see his physician, remaining here until yesterday at noon, when he returned to his home. Mr. Glotfelty met many friends while in Oakland who expressed their satisfaction that his injuries were of no more serious consequences.

The United States is the only country in which the son of the poorest mechanic or laboring man may become its ruler and where the daughter of a farmer may become the wife of the President and the mother of Senators. It is the only country where all earthly honors are within the reach of every citizen and where it depends upon the individual himself whether he will be a Senator or a street-sweeper, a railroad president or a railroad section hand, a millionaire or a pauper, a general or a policeman, a banker or a bankrupt.

There are two kinds of girls in the world, the girl who works and the girl who gads. Commend us to the former. Work lends dignity to a pretty girl, is an added charm to her. The girl who works God bless her, combines the useful and the ornamental. She might gad about, roll on sofas, gossip and read story books, but she prefers to be of some account in the world and goes out as stenographer, teacher, saleslady or housekeeper, bravely makes her own way. Such are the salt of the earth and of such is the kingdom of heaven.

THE DEATH RECORD.

CHARLES LAUGHLIN.

Died, at his home in Deer Park on Thursday morning last, after an illness of several months of tuberculosis, Charles Laughlin, aged about twenty-six years. The deceased was a son of the late Rev. John Laughlin, for many years a minister of the M. E. church, who died a number of years ago. He is survived by his mother, sister, wife and two children. The deceased was employed by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company as a telegraph operator.

His funeral took place on Saturday morning at 11 o'clock, being attended by a large concourse of friends and relatives. The interment was made in the Deer Park cemetery.

ARCHIBALD CASTEEL.

On last Thursday night at ten o'clock the angel of death appeared at the home of Mr. Archibald Casteel, a well known and highly esteemed citizen of District No. 2, claiming and carrying away with it the spirit of Mr. Casteel. The deceased had been ill but a very short time, and his death was wholly unexpected. Some members of his family were absent at the time and the news of his demise was quite a shock to them and to his large circle of friends. Mr. Casteel's funeral was conducted at the Blooming Rose M. E. church on Sunday morning by Rev. A. L. Donachy, which was largely attended by many friends and relatives of the deceased. The interment was made in the cemetery adjoining the church where the remains were deposited beside those of his wife who preceded him to the great beyond several years ago.

MRS. TOBIAS KILMER.

Died, at the Maryland University Hospital, Baltimore, yesterday morning, Mrs. Tobias Kilmer, aged fifty years and four months. Mrs. Kilmer was an invalid for many years and recently was taken to the hospital in Baltimore where an operation was performed with the hope that her condition would be improved. Her remains were received in Oakland this morning on train No. 3 and conveyed to her late home at Crellin. The funeral will occur on Saturday. She leaves her husband and one daughter, the former an employe of the Kendall Lumber Company and the latter one of Garrett county's most progressive teachers.

Easter at Spruce Hill.

By FRANK H. SWEET.

Copyright, 1906, by Frank H. Sweet.

A NEW minister had come to slow moving, out of the way Spruce Hill, and with his coming had appeared a spirit of change and improvement.

He was fresh from his theological course and eager with youth and love for the work and with advanced ideas about music and active co-operation of the young people. Hitherto the church had been to them a place of solemnity, only to be visited at required intervals and as a scarcely to be avoided duty. Now, under the ministrations of this young zealot, it gradually came to them that duty could be approached from many directions and that not all of them were necessarily thorny and narrow. A choir was formed and a singing class started to stimulate and encourage greater proficiency; then came a Bible class, in which the lessons were presented in a way to encourage interest, and a Christian Endeavor society that brought out the young people. At Christmas there was an entertainment with much singing, and during the winter there were praise services and social gatherings, and in June a sermon especially for the children, and through the summer and fall picnics and outings that brought all the people together and kept their interest in the church undiminished.

Among the other innovations were the Easter sermon and church decoration. The new minister made the announcement one Thursday evening after prayer meeting and added that he hoped all would be present and that the ladies of the church would arrange for a tasteful and appropriate decoration.

After service the women stood about irresolutely, looking at each other with blank, questioning eyes. Spruce Hill was undeniably on the road toward prosperity, but its people had not yet loosened their grasp on the labor that was bearing them there. Every woman and girl of the community, from the eight year mite who washed dishes and "chored" to the white haired grandmother knitting in the corner, had duties for each hour of the day. It was the natural condition of the hard, unsocial life which had taught them to value the practical and substantial and remain ignorant of much that was beautiful and sweet. They had little time for flowers and, besides the lilac bushes and "popcorns" in their yards and a few such perennials as lilies and phlox and daffodils and perhaps a geranium or calla in their kitchen windows, had literally nothing for even an outdoor summer display, much less for a church decoration at Easter. And even had there been a profusion of flowers they would have been scarcely less dismayed. The mere thought of decorating a church would have appalled them.

"I guess you'll have to excuse me, Mr. Kent," one of them said at last bluntly. "I haven't any flowers except one geranium which don't bloom, an', besides, I don't know anything about decoratin' an' ain't got no time either."

"Nor me," "Nor me," "Nor me," came in rapid succession and with evident relief from the other women.

"Oh, come, come; this will never do," expostulated the minister decidedly. "Surely each of you can spare a little time from work. I will help with the lifting and carrying, and there are several boys in my class who will do what they can. Let us all join together and make it a grand success."

"I GUESS YOU'LL HAVE TO EXCUSE ME, MR. KENT."

"We can't decorate without flowers," spoke up another woman convincingly, "an' I don't believe there's half a dozen bloomin' plants in the whole neighborhood. 'Tain't time yet for flowers to bloom."

"Can't we find a few callas and Easter lilies, narcissuses and perhaps a few other white flowers?" with less confidence in his voice. "Palms would suit me best for a background, but as we cannot get them we can use green boughs and pussy willows and other things from the woods."

"All the houses in the neighborhood can't scare up white posies enough for a buttonhole bouquet," declared a third woman aggressively. "As for Easter lilies, I ain't never seen one, and narcissus I ain't even heard of. The idea o' decoratin' a whole church this time o' year!"

"I've heard Mis' Bray speak o' narcissus," said a woman reflectively, "she that was the florist's wife, you know. An', come to think, she's likely a master hand at this decoratin' business. She has spoke o' seein' big city churches filled with flowers."

"Mis' Bray—ain't she dead?" questioned another. "I ain't heard her name afore in years. But there! I know she ain't. I'd 'a' seen the notice in the Articulator."

"Who is Mrs. Bray, and where is she to be found?" asked the minister quickly. "Perhaps she can help me out with this. Curious I have not heard of her before."

"Oh, I don't know," dryly; "folks sort o' die away from the world after they enter a poorhouse. Mis' Bray's husband was for gettin' on, so he went to the city an' learned the florist's trade. For a time he done well; then his business broke, an' he died, an' his wife came back here an' lived up what little she had. After that there was nothin' but the poorhouse. Now, I've always held a poorhouse was stronger than a grave for hidin' folks."

"Well, we will find her," eagerly. "Perhaps she will be able to give us some assistance or advice. Will you go with me, Mrs. Perry?"

The woman hesitated a little, then threw back her head with sudden decision.

"Why, yes, I don't mind if I do. Cynthia Bray was as much of a lady as anybody round, an' I don't know as a poorhouse is the worst thing in the world. Still, while it wa'n't her fault goin' there, it's hardly to be expected folks will keep on visitin' just the same as though she was in some other place."

The next afternoon the minister's buckboard paused in front of the poorhouse, and he and Mrs. Perry alighted. Several men and boys were slouching about the yard, and on a bench near the door were four or five old women. Mrs. Perry looked them over critically.

"Not there," she declared concisely. "Cynthia wouldn't grow to look like them. We'll go in."

In answer to their knock a harsh featured woman came to the door. A ring of keys dangled from her waist.

"Mis' Bray?" she repeated in answer to their question. "Oh, Aunt Cynthia we call her. No, she ain't here; she's inside. You see, we have to get as much work from the paupers as we can. Most of them are lazy an' no 'count, but now an' then we find a good worker. Aunt Cynthia's one, so we keep her in the kitchen. She scasely ever gits to this side o' the house. I don't s'pose she's really had a visitor afore in five years. Won't you come in?"

They entered, and after a long and detailed account of her trials with the paupers the woman went through a door toward the back part of the house. Another five minutes passed; then a little old woman with a bright, deprecatory manner stole softly into the room.

"Did—did you wish to see me?" she asked tremulously and a little wonderingly.

Mrs. Perry sprang forward in quick forgetfulness of the immeasurable distance which lay between her social position and the poorhouse.

"Why, you poor soul!" she cried sympathetically. "How old you've grown! My hair ain't begun to turn yet, an' here your'n is perfectly white, an' still I believe I'm two months the oldest."

"It's been a long time since you and I were young, deary," answered the old woman gently. "Such a weary time, it seems as if my hair was always white." Then she colored with sudden remembrance and drew herself up stiffly.

"Is there anything you wanted me for, Mrs. Perry—anything I can do for you?" she asked.

"Come, Cynthia, don't talk that way," remonstrated Mrs. Perry. "You know farmers' wives are always workin', an'—an' it's a good piece from our place to the"—

"Poorhouse," said the old woman calmly.

"Well, yes, poorhouse," deprecatingly. "An', besides, folks give up old customs as they git on in years. I don't call anywhere as much as I used to. But never mind that," briskly. "I'm callin' today, an' I've brung the minister. Do you know him?"

"I don't think I've had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Bray before," said the minister, rising, "and yet I have called here several times."

"No, we haven't met," acquiesced the old woman. "I generally stay in the kitchen."

He held her hand for a moment.

"I must acknowledge this visit is mostly a business one, Mrs. Bray," he said, resuming his seat. "You see, I am planning to have the church decorated for Easter, but the ladies of my congregation, including Mrs. Perry here, assure me that such a thing is utterly impossible—in short, that they cannot undertake the work and that there are no flowers to undertake it with. I have come to you as a last resort. Can you help me?"

The old woman, who had not had a caller in five years, looked from one to the other with a sudden yearning in her tender old eyes. It was as though she questioned the possibility of the world still having use for her. Then a soft flush began to steal over her face.

"It isn't easy to decorate without anything to decorate with," she said tremulously. "In the city we used to have palms and Easter lilies and no end of ferns and delicate things to bank with."

"But there are the woods," suggested the minister desperately. "I notice lots of pretty things on my walks."

"Yes, the woods are beautiful around here in the spring. I notice them from the kitchen windows, and sometimes, before anybody is up, I take short walks." Her hands were still trembling, but into her face was coming an expression which Mrs. Perry remembered to have belonged to her old days, before the long stifling experience of poorhouse servitude.

"Do you mean for me to take charge of the decoratiag," she asked, "to do it in my own way?"

"Yes, but of course with plenty of help. I don't know much about arranging flowers myself."

He turned hastily and glanced through the window. Something in the wistful, even rapturous expression on the old woman's face made him lose command of himself for a moment.

"Well, I shall need help in gathering the decorations," she was saying as he turned back. "There will be things to cut and bring home and boxes and boards to build up for the banking. Yes, I think we can do it very nicely. There are some bushes along the creek that I can fix up to look very much like palms at a little distance, and that dark moss below the ledge will make a beautiful bank, on which we can arrange the early white flowers which are beginning to bloom on the hillsides. Then there are the pussy willows and early ferns and lots of other things that can be used with good effect. Yes, indeed, we can make a charming decoration with what the woods and fields will furnish. But there!" breaking into a low, joyous laugh which apparently frightened her, for she stopped suddenly and looked about in a scared, tremulous sort of way. "I was only about to say," she went on deprecatingly, "that I haven't seen the church yet. I must go there and look around so as to get an idea of what sort of decoration will be most appropriate."

"WILL YOU COME AND LOOK AFTER THE PARSONAGE?"

"Of course; we will take you there this afternoon," volunteered the minister beamingly.

"An' you can have my horse an' wagon every afternoon if you like," added Mrs. Perry warmly. "Then there is my son Tommy. You can have him to drive you an' to do your gatherin' an' liftin'. Why, really, I almost feel as though I would like to leave work an' join in the fun myself."

The old woman's face was now absolutely radiant.

"It will be beautiful," she murmured, "as the world seemed when I was young."

She was not thinking of the decoration now, but of the beautiful thing of not being forgotten that had come so unexpectedly to her.

"Yes, it will be beautiful," she repeated. "God is good to have remembered me so lovingly."

The minister gazed at her a moment and then turned again to the window.

"There will be no failure in the church decoration," he remarked to Mrs. Perry.

Nor was there, nor in the beautiful thing that had come to the little old woman. During the decoration she was like a different creature, and her face came to be scarcely recognizable as that which had looked so deprecatingly at them that afternoon in the poorhouse. When it was all over the minister went to her impulsively and grasped both her hands.

"I cannot tell you how much you have helped me," he said earnestly. "The decoration has been a perfect success, and it is all owing to you. But there is another thing I wish to speak about. My housekeeper is going to leave, and I need some one to take her place. Will you come and look after the parsonage—and me, too, for that matter?" with one of his frank boyish smiles. "My mother always said I wasn't capable of looking after my clothes and such things. I will try not to tax you too severely."

So the beautiful thing which had come to her was not of a day, but was to last through all the remainder of her years.

A Famous Anachronism.

There is a well known picture showing the embarkation of the pilgrim fathers which contains a world famous anachronism. The sailors are hoisting a flag, and, curiously enough, it is the union jack, though the union jack was not known until about two and a half centuries after these sturdy pilgrim fathers sailed away to this country in the good ship Mayflower.—St. James' Gazette.

His Concert Toilet.

A musical director was talking about old fashioned concerts.

"Some of the hits directed at these concerts were merited," he said. "One hit, and a good one, was made by an old Chicago millionaire. He called upstairs to his daughters:

"'What a time you girls take getting ready for the concert! Look at me; a bit of wadding in each ear and I'm all ready.'"

THE SOCIETY OF EQUITY.

An Organization Which Seeks to Control Prices of Farm Produce.

With considerable flourish of trumpets the Society of Equity, a farmers' organization, has announced its purpose to secure that great desideratum of western farmers, "dollar wheat." It has established headquarters in Chicago, from which point it will direct operations. It proposes not only to raise the price of wheat, but to eliminate the middleman's profits. Remarking editorially on this proposition, the Outlook of New York says that many attempts at accomplishing this, ranging from the social grange to the political Farmers' Alliance, have been made and all have failed. A looseness of organization when dealing with farmers widely separated and unwilling to undertake co-operative effort on a large scale has been the inevitable result of these unions. This modern undertaking evidently is not free from such dangers, for it is reported that the cotton raisers of western Texas to the number of 100,000 have seceded from the central organization and will manage their own affairs. Lectures by itinerant organizers and conventions for the display of oratory will not hold a nation wide organization together, much less one composed of farmers, and this new union must have behind it a direct, simple plan for betterment of the agricultural communities if it is to win permanently. The farmer almost alone of the toilers of the world has kept his independent way. He has no walking delegate, no union scale, no system of licensed apprenticeship. Neither has he indulged in high finance nor in the formation of powerful trusts. Yet upon his labor is based much of the prosperity that makes possible the trust magnate's development.

It is possible that the new union has 700,000 members, but unless they are held with unyielding force and obey the directorate as one man it will have little effect in realizing the dream of "dollar wheat," which seems to be the western farmer's ideal of material bliss. If the farmers of the nation succeed in raising materially the price of their crops at initial points, the consumer must prepare to pay more for the finished product when delivered at his door unless the rise to the farmer shall come not from the consumer, but in lessened expense of getting the product to market. Some day this may be accomplished, but reports concerning the present undertaking do not indicate that it is to succeed permanently in changing the American farmer's condition, which, by the way, is not one of great suffering.

A GOOD IDEA.

The Annual Pass Card Used by a Vermont Grange.

Union grange, No. 351, of West Hartford, Vt., issues a membership or pass card that is very complete and serves a good purpose. It is shown below:

Union Grange No. 351.
West Hartford, Vt.
ANNUAL PASS CARD.

Received of ..... and twenty cents ($1.20), the same being the yearly dues up to Dec. 31, 19__. The bearer, the said ..... is now entitled to the A. W. and all the privileges appertaining to the Order of P. of H. everywhere.

Seal of Union Grange.

Date..... 19__ Secretary.
Master.
Signed when he gave A. W.

The advantages of this card are that it is a membership card showing member's grange connection, a pass card in case the bearer forgets the A. W., a traveling card good everywhere. In case the grange issuing the card should ever become dormant it would be accepted the same as a demit card by any grange to which the bearer should seek admission.

Report on Ritual.

The report of the committee on degree work at the recent session of the Massachusetts state grange was a most excellent one. We make a single extract:

"In no order is there a better chance to exemplify its teachings than in the Patrons of Husbandry. With a lesson for each degree and a ritual which leads us progressively, step by step, through the degree, we have a splendid chance to impress the candidates with the teachings of our Order. With four degrees, representing the four seasons, and the lessons changing to correspond to the changes in the seasons, we have a ritual that is based on nature and takes its teachings from the brown soil. There are no more beautiful or impressive sentiments expressed in the language of any ritual than in our own, and any officer that fails to do his or her duty by studying and learning their lectures does the Order a great injustice and cannot expect to make a favorable impression on the candidates."

The man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

Civil Liberty Is Endangered by Overlegislation.

By Archbishop JOHN IRELAND.

THE mania for legislation frequently shelters itself under the name of MORAL REFORM. Far from me to oppose prudent legislation for the betterment of morality when crime is to be punished, natural rights to be safeguarded or a great and wholesome measure to be supported, but far from me, also, to support the moral legislation which at best promises no results to compensate for the ABRIDGMENT OF PUBLIC CIVIL LIBERTY, which assumes to so cover the ground of morals that no room remains for the free willed action of conscience.

Today another form of legislative mania arises from the industrial restlessness into which our times have brought us. Here again let there be laws to punish injustice and wrong whether on the part of the weakling or the strong, on that of the laborer or of the capitalist. Let there be laws wisely reaching out to the encouragement of social peace and of SOCIAL PROSPERITY. But let us be on our guard that in the pursuit of justice we do not bring on injustice, that in coveting social prosperity we do not encounter social disaster AND CHAOS. Above all other things let us be sure to despoil ourselves of all throbbings of envy, jealousy, hatred in our clamorings for industrial legislation.

There is in the land today the delusion that men may become rich through legislation in lieu of toil and economy: that to build up one class naught else is needed than to pull down another, and there is growing up among us a HATRED OF SUCCESS in others, however much that success may have been the reward of praiseworthy effort. That accumulations of capital, corporations, trusts may have had their faults and may need to be watched by the state with indulgence and care I shall not deny. But this much I do deny, that accumulations of capital and corporations are to be PREJUDGED as guilty; that men having part in them are to be deemed almost as without right to work, without right to fair play, which is the native appanage of all Americans.

And this I deny, that all men are equally talented, equally farseeing, equally industrious; that consequently all are more or less entitled to an equal possession of wealth or an equal industrial reward. This I deny, that men, being as they are by nature and by habit, society can EVER be without its rich and its comparatively poor; that American industries and enterprises can ever thrive and hold their own in worldwide competition without here and there, ministering to its needs, large accumulations of wealth and consequently large gatherings of men into associations as CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS WEALTH. Destroy great enterprises, make impossible the unification of many individual energies, and if equality there comes it will be EQUALITY OF MEDIOCRITY and social poverty.

LET THERE BE LEGISLATION WITH EYE SINGLE TO THE GENERAL WELFARE WHICH IS FOSTERED BY JUSTICE TO ALL, BY WISDOM IN ADOPTION OF METHODS, BY A FULL RECOGNITION OF THE LAWS OF NATURE IN THE INDIVIDUAL LIFE OF MEN, IN ECONOMIC RELATIONS OF ONE CLASS OF MEN TOWARD ANOTHER AND OF ALL CLASSES OF MEN TOWARD THE NATION AT LARGE.

The Heroism of Women.

By CARMEN SYLVA, Queen of Roumania.

HOWEVER perfect a marriage may APPEAR, something—indeed, its highest crown of glory—is missing if the blessing of children be denied it. CHILDLESSNESS IS ONE OF THE BITTEREST TRIALS IN A WOMAN'S LIFE, and few can tell how hard the struggle may have been ere she learned to resign herself to her lot. To make it harder still to bear the absence of this link, the fact that not one pledge of their mutual affection has been granted them to carry on their name, this, their common disappointment, may by the cruel irony of fate become a source of ESTRANGEMENT to the unfortunate couple. Even where this does not take place, even if they have not drifted apart, one may read the whole extent of their disappointment in the eyes of such a childless couple when they rest on the children of others. To them the largest family does not seem too numerous. It will appear to them that those on whom this blessing has been most richly bestowed HARDLY VALUE IT SUFFICIENTLY.

And yet their sorrow, to whom heaven has never granted a child, is as nothing compared to the unspeakable anguish those parents feel who have known this highest happiness, BUT LOST IT. No other pain is like to this. It is indeed almost beyond the power of human endurance to bear. And should then also their common sorrow, instead of drawing them closer together, tend but to estrange the bereaved parents; should the little grave, in which all that made life worth living, ALL THEIR HOPES AND JOYS LIE FOREVER BURIED, remain but as an open gulf between them, heaven help them then, for earthly help or consolation there is none in the immensity of such distress.

Even under ordinary circumstances, where the two stand bravely side by side to bear their loss together, it is overwhelming enough in itself to cast an ETERNAL BLIGHT over both their lives. Above all, may heaven help the poor mother on whom falls so cruel a blow, for in her case there is an actual bodily pang, her own flesh and blood being rent from her, in addition to the tearing asunder of the heartstrings, to the INTOLERABLE ANGUISH OF THE SOUL.

NO LESS DEGREE OF STOICAL FORTITUDE IS DEMANDED OF HER THAN THAT SHOWN BY A PATIENT UNDER THE SURGEON'S KNIFE, AND SHE KNOWS EQUALLY WELL THAT THE WOUND INFLICTED ON HER—EVEN IF IT APPARENTLY HEALS AND SHE SEEMS TO RECOVER FROM IT—WILL AT THE BEST LEAVE HER WITH AN UNSIGHTLY SCAR, SENSITIVE TO THE TOUCH, FOR THE REST OF HER LIFE.

SOMETHING ABOUT REV. CHARLES ROADS

The New General Secretary of the Maryland Sunday School Association.

In the 63 years of its existence the Maryland Sunday School Association—formerly the Maryland Sunday School Union—has done much for the Sunday schools of the state. It is now proposed to extend the work of the association and do it more effectively. And it is felt that the new general secretary, Rev. Charles Roads, D. D., is the right man to represent the ideas of the association and carry forward its plans. Dr. Roads has had extended experience in Sunday school work, having been general secretary of the Pennsylvania State Sunday School Association from 1897 to 1901, and since then general field secretary of the Methodist Episcopal Sunday School Union. As a matter of fact, Dr Roads has been actively engaged in Sunday school work since boyhood. He taught a class at 14 and was an assistant superintendent at 17. After entering the ministry he served prominent churches in Philadelphia and nearby towns for several years, paying especial attention to the development of Sunday schools and young people's work.

In 1892-3 he was president of the Pennsylvania Christian Endeavor Union. He served as chairman of evangelistic work at several international Christian Endeavor conventions, and was the originator of the plan of holding religious meetings in factories, stores and shops in connection with conventions.

While a pastor in Philadelphia Dr. Roads was at the head of the movement whice gave the children of that city their summer playgrounds in school inclosures, on wharves and in parks—a movement that has spread to other cities. He was active also in the Law and Order League, and Social Purity Alliance and the Pennsylvania Prison Society.

For three years he was associated with the remarkable group of men who have made Pennsylvania's organized Sunday school work famous—John Wanamaker, H. J. Heinz, Dr. C. R Blackall, S. E. Gill, Dr. Alexander Henry and others. Every present phase of the work was wonderfully developed during those years—normal work the decision day movement, house-to-house visitation, home department, grading, supplemental lessons and city institutes. The state associations furnish such inspiration and help to local workers that the whole state became organized and frequent conventions were held with large attendance.

When, in 1901, Dr. Roads became general field secretary of the Sunday school work of the M. E. Church he entered upon an era of wider helpfulness. Since then he has traveled about 25,000 miles a year, made 450 to 500 addresses each year and held institutes and conventions in 32 states.

He was first to give courses of lectures to colleges and universities on Sunday school work and Bible study. Dr. Roads has also done a considerable amount of literary work. He has been on the editorial staff of the Christian Standard, the Philadelphia Methodist, the Christian Statesman and other journals; has prepared primary and beginners' lessons and published a number of books on Sunday school work. Dr. Roads regards Maryland as an unusually promising field for the best modern Sunday school development. The conservative and church-going character of the people, and especially the large number of men in the churches, the fact that Sunday school sessions are almost invariably in the afternoon, the lively interest exhibited in recent conventions, together with other indications, points to a commanding place for this state in Sunday school work.

HOYES.

Miss Sadie Friend, Messrs. Willie Bishoff and Alvin Lowdermilk, who have been absent for the past winter spent Easter with their parents.

Miss Carrie Glover and Mr. Fear were quietly married at the home of the bride last Sunday morning. Rev. H. E. Friend was the officiating minister.

Miss Hazel Poland was a pleasant guest of Miss Bernadette Mattingly, Tuesday evening this week.

Mr. Lee Dewitt, of Sang Run, moved his family to to this place last week, and is now a resident of Hoyes.

Prof. A. W. DeWitt, teacher of Crellin school, and daughter Miss Olive, one of Friendsville's teachers, spent several days in Hoyes visiting relatives.

Mr. J. W. Lyons, who has resided in this community for several years past made a sale of his property Tuesday of this week, and with his family will shortly leave for Upper Potomac Mines where he has obtained employment.

Mr. Allen Enlow, of near here, and also quite an aged citizen, is dangerously ill at this writing.

Mrs. Sallie Glotfelty, expects to move to Oakland in a few days where she will make her future home. We wish her abundant success in her new home. She will be greatly missed in this neighborhood as she has many warm friends.

Miss Freda DeWitt entertained as her guests Easter Sunday Misses Sadie and Rosa Wilburn, Miss Auburn Smith and brother Earl.

Miss Mae Atkinson, of Lonaconing, returned to her home Monday of this week after spending two weeks in Hoyes with her acquaintances.

Miss Ethel DeWitt accompanied by Mr. C. Callis were among the number from this place who attended Easter services at Friendsville last Sunday night.

Mr. Fred Miller, of Accident, and Mr. H. H. Flick, principal of Sang Run school, spent a few hours in Hoyes Monday afternoon.

Mr. and Mrs. M. Mattingly were callers at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Thad Hinebaugh last Sunday.

Miss Ollie Cuppett returned to her home at this place Wednesday of this week after spending several months with her cousin, Mrs. Masden Casteel, near Oakland.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The social given at the residence of Mrs. J. A. Hayden Monday evening was a success in every way. The receipts for the evening were near nine dollars. The ladies of the Aid Society reported how they had invested their dimes given them by the society some months ago. The aggregate reported was over twenty-eight dollars. Miss Irma Squires led with over six dollars and Mrs. Hayden standing second with nearly six dollars.

The M. E. church now has a parsonage, having secured the Howard Eckles cottage on I street. This is a large, well constructed house one square from the church. Rev. Westfall, the pastor, will occupy the building in the near future.

Mr. Bowman, who will assist in Mr. Hammond's store this season, will occupy the Rembold cottage as soon as it is vacated by Rev. Westfall.

Mrs. Fannie L. Sperry and daughter Virginia are visiting relatives in Baltimore.

Mrs. McKinney arrived Tuesday and will occupy her cottage on D street. Her grandchildren, the son and daughters of Rev. C. E. Clark, will spend the season with her.

The ladies of the Baptist church of Loch Lynn secured about fifteen dollars at their social Tuesday evening. The money is for the missionary cause of that church.

The "Red Men" held a big pow-wow and banquet in Assembly Hall Wednesday evening, when twenty-eight were initiated, fourteen of them being prominent young men of Oakland. The balance were from Deer Park, Mountain Lake Park and Loch Lynn. The order here numbers one hundred and five members and is likely to greatly increase in numbers.

Mr. C. W. Hopkins, our real estate agent, reports the sale of Eastwood cottage to Mr. E. O. Fouch, the telegraph operator at the signal tower here.

Mr. Hopkins also reports the rental of "Briar Bend," to Mrs. E. S. Fetters and the Woodcock cottage to Mrs. Johnson, of New York.

Superintendent Davis announced that the Electric Light Co. would maintain an all-night service within the appropriation made at the last Annual Meeting.

The grounds are being put in order and from present indications will present a more attractive appearance than for several years. There is abundant room for improvement.

The last report with reference to the Chautauqua Hotel, (and we hope it's true), is that Mr. W. C. Dunnington has leased that popular house for the season.

BITTINGER.

This week begins with the mercury away down and a sprinkling of snow in the air. The sudden transition from the spring like conditions last week to this wintry blast has not been pleasant, but the sugar makers at least are rejoicing in anticipation of a run of the "sweet water."

Since last Friday morning our neighbor Jacob Brenneman has been sitting on his front gate post armed with his old shot gun and halts every passer-by and with a "grange grin" informs them thut he has a "bran spanker new baby girl in the house."

Mrs. Fanny Witzell and son George, of Avilton, were visiting relatives here over Sunday.

Samuel J. Brenneman, one of our most competent road supervisors, has a gang of men at work on the road and wherever "Uncle Sammy" works you may expect good roads.

Misses Clara Slabach and Elizabeth Lichty, of Gortner, are guests of Mr. and Mrs. Melhhoir Hetrich this week.

'Squire Wade H. Lohr, of Swanton, was in this village one day last week.

George Yommer and family, of Jennings, spent last Sunday in this village.

F. M. Bittinger made a special business trip over to Somerset county, Pa., where he spent his Easter and looked quite happy upon his return, and it is rumored the day is set.

Rev. J. B. Shoup and family are arranging to occupy the parsonage this week.

Miss Florence Bittinger, of Springs, Pa., was visiting at C. E. Ellithorp's early this week.

THE OLD TURNPIKE.

We hear no more of the clanging hoof,
And the stage-coach rattling by;
For the steam-king rules the traveled world,
The grass creeps o'er the flinty path,
And the healthy daisies steal
Where once the stage horse, day by day,
Lifted his iron heel.

No more the weary stranger dreads
The toil of the coming morn:
No more the bustling landlord runs
At the sound of the echoing horn;
For the dust lies still upon the road
And bright-eyed children play,
Where once the clattering hoof and wheel
Rattled along the way.

No more we hear the cracking whip
Or the strong wheel's rumbling sound
And oh! the water drives us on,
And an Iron-Horse is found!
The coach stands rusting in the yard,
And the horse has sought the plow;
We have spanned the world with an iron rail,
And the steam-king rules us now.

The old Turnpike is a pike no more,
Wide open stands the gate;
We have made us a road for our horse to stride,
Which we ride at a flying rate;
We have filled the valleys and leveled the hills,
And tunneled the mountain side,
And round the rough crag's dizzy verge
Fearlessly now we ride.

Farewell forever old Turnpike!
Your day of glory's past;
You filled the role to you assigned,
And well may rest at last.
Like some great hero's tragic death,
Of which historians tell,
Your sad decay evokes a sigh;
Forever now farewell.

Letter to G. H. Pritchard.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: Here's honesty for you! North Dakota has a pure paint law. Prof. Ladd, the state chemist analyzes a certain paint labeled "contains only lead and zinc and is strictly pure," and finds in it no lead at all, a resinous oil, and benzine. It is, however, full-measure and contains no water.

That's like the man on trial for killing his grandmother; proved that he didn't set fire to the house.

No lead, but zinc and barytes, resinous oil, and benzine—"strictly pure lead and zinc paint!"

Pure paint is lead-zinc-and-oil; but that isn't all; there is such a thing as proportion and make. The strongest paint is Devoe.

North Dakota is doing a handsome thing in holding these confidence-people up to scorn. She gives their names as well as their works.

Yours truly,

SUNNYSIDE.

Prof. Ira Groves has been teaching music at this place with most excellent results, we learn. The Professor possesses the happy faculty of imparting instructions in a way that tells, and his class, we are told appreciates his instruction in a high degree. The Professor is rich in experience and has but few equals in his line.

There has been considerable sickness in this community the past winter but the people are in a fair state of health at this time.

Miss Nettie Brenninger, of near this place, accompanied by her cousin, Miss Annie Gortner, of Gortner, returned last week from Bittinger were they had visited the former's sister, Mrs. J. T. Lohr.

The public school at this place has been a success this past winter in the usual way. Since the public school has closed we hope there will be more interest taken by our people in Sunday School work and that the attendance will be increased in all the classes and particularly in the bible class.

Our minister, Rev. Koser, is putting forth every reasonable effort to build a new church at Red House for the use of St. John's Evangelical Lutheran Congregation. Material for same is being placed on the ground and construction work will begin at once. The old building has been in use for more than forty years and is no longer considered safe or fit for use.

LEAF BLIGHT.

It Frequently Causes Much Damage to the Strawberry Crop.

Strawberry leaf blight frequently causes great damage to the strawberry crop, as explained by a grower in Rural New Yorker, who says that it makes its appearance about the time the fruit sets and begins its destructive ravages as the berries begin to ripen. It first manifests itself by turning the leaves a brownish red; it will then attack the fruit stems and hulls, cutting off the supply of nourishment from the berries; the calyx begins to wither and dry up, and the berries become soft and insipid and are of little value.

As the Berry Season Advances.

It usually grows more destructive as the berry season advances. The conditions conducive to the development of the disease appear to be a general weakness of the plants. This may be brought about from various causes, such as old and wornout beds, impoverished soil, plants with a heavy set of fruit with insufficient nourishment, plants exposed during winter without protection or unmulched beds during hot, dry weather. Any one of these conditions will have a tendency to weaken the constitution of the plants, making them an easy prey to rust, blight and other diseases.

Kinds Susceptible to Blight.

During the time we have been engaged in growing strawberries we have found some varieties so constitutionally strong in their vegetative parts and so vigorous in their fruit organs that they will do well almost anywhere, while other sorts are constitutionally weak in foliage, yet strong in fruit bearing propensities. They set a great quantity of berries with little or no vitality to mature the fruit. Such varieties are very susceptible to blight and should not be cultivated except by those who are well acquainted with their natural requirements. It requires a healthy, vigorous foliage to digest the various plant foods found in the different soils, and probably the safest method of protecting the plants from blight and other fungous diseases is to conserve moisture by thorough cultivation while the plants are growing, protecting them well during the winter with a liberal mulch of horse manure. This material if left on the plant during the summer prevents the escape of moisture at a time it is most needed, and it keeps the soil cool—in fact, it is to the bearing bed what the cultivation is to the newly planted field.

THE LINCOLN PLUM.

A Variety of Rare Beauty and Excellent For Market.

The Lincoln plum here shown is described by the Ohio experiment station as being a variety of rare beauty and excellent for market, one of the best second early plums; quite free from rot in some seasons; first blossoms May 7, full bloom May 10, last blossoms May 15; in full fruitage Aug. 15.

Fruit large to very large, roundish oblong, blunt at apex, slightly necked; stem long and strong and set at an angle; suture distinct, slightly depressed; color light greenish yellow, overspread with a beautiful shade of crimson; dots many, very minute and indistinct; bloom, thin lilac; flesh light yellow, firm; pit rather large, free; quality only fair; tree only a moderate grower, but healthy, and forms a round, shapely head; foliage very luxuriant; leaves large; quite prolific, but not so much so as to require thinning of the fruit.

THE LINCOLN PLUM.

Rough Feeds.

Rough feeds, including pasture, are usually so plentiful that frequently we feed them without any idea as to what and how much will produce the desired results. Much rough feed is wasted in careless feeding. The cow will eat the best of her menu first and if given too much will pick the most desirable morsels, leaving what might be called passably good, which too frequently is treated as waste and thrown underfoot. No more hay should be given an animal than it will eat up clean. This refers to first class quality, however, as we could not expect a cow to eat up clean a poor quality of hay.

Poultry Products and Wheat.

The values of poultry products now reach an annual figure of half a billion dollars or more, or an amount about equal to the value of the wheat crop. The price of eggs has been high and growing higher for several years, because consumers have wanted more eggs than have been produced. The exports are not worth mentioning. Apparently there is no limit to the consumption of fresh eggs at a moderate price.—G. K. Holmes.

RAILROAD TIED UP BY COSTLY WRECK

Broken Wheel Piled Up Twenty Cars in a Deep Cut.

A costly freight wreck occurred on the Pittsburg division of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, one mile west of Philson, about twenty miles northwest of Cumberland, late Tuesday afternoon. A broken wheel caused twenty steel coal hoppers, all loaded, to be piled in a mass in a deep cut. It was reported that the engineer and fireman were killed, but later it was stated that one brakeman only was slightly bruised. The wreckage was so hard to get at that the division was closed nearly a day. All express trains betwen Cumland and Pittsburg were sent by the way of Oakland. A rigger train and a messenger train of two coaches were sent from Cumberland, the latter to bring here transferred passengers from train No. 56.

Trains No. 14, 12 and 4 were all sent by Fairmont and Oakland.

HOYES.

Mr. Allen Enlow died at the home of William Bowman near this place last Sunday evening. Mr. Enlow had suffered for some time past with brights disease, and was confined to his room but a few weeks; he had reached the ripe old age of 75 years. He was highly esteemed by all who knew him. He was unmarried, yet left quite a number of near relatives. Funeral services were conducted at Sang Run M. E. church by Revs. Lister and H. E. Friend Tuesday afternoon at 1 o'clock, after which the interment was made in Sang Run Cemetery.

The public school at this place will close Thursday. Our teacher Miss Bernadette Mattingly has taught a very successful school the past winter. We hope always to be able to obtain as competent a teacher as she has been.

Mr. W. A. Smith attended a bank meeting at Oakland last Saturday.

Miss Mary Friend of Sang Run has been visiting Miss Mamie DeWitt the past week.

Among some of the teachers from this place who have returned to their homes are Misses Eve Welch, Dessie Callis, Olia Mattimgly and Mr. Burns Lowdermilk.

Miss Hazel Poland returned to her home at Westernport last Saturday after spending the winter in this neighborhood as teacher of the Bishoff school.

Mr. Will Glotfelty, of near Crellin, spent a few days this week with his uncle Freeman DeWitt.

Mr. Joseph McRobie, lineman for the Garrett County Telephone Co., made a trip to Addison this week, stopping at Hoyes on his way.

MET SUDDEN DEATH AT MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Emerson Schell. Aged Nineteen. Instantly Killed Yesterday Afternoon.

Yesterday afternoon train No. 55, running at the rate of more than forty miles an hour, struck and instantly killed Emerson Schell, aged nineteen years, at the crossing at Mountain Lake Park, throwing his body high in the air and descending it fell upon the platform in front of the ticket office of the station, a distance of more than fifty feet from where the engine caught the unfortunate young man.

From an eye witness to the sad occurrence it has been learned that young Schell was on the south side of the track and attemped to cross to the opposite side just before an east bound freight train which was just approaching, not being aware of the approach of the passenger train from the east. He had nearly cleared the track when he was overtaken.

The deceased was the son of Mr. and Mrs. Z. P. Schell, who recently removed to Mountain Lake Park from Maysville, W. Va. He was a most exemplary young man, being a member of the M. E. church.

His funeral will occur this afternoon, Rev. Westfall, of the Park, officiating, with interment in the cemetery on the Meese farm east of the Park.

Fish for Garrett Streams.

Last Thursday night some fifteen thousand brook trout from the Government Hatchery located in Virginia were received in Oakland for planting in several streams in Garrett county. The fish were one year old, measuring nearly three inches each in length, and were apparently in the best condition possible, extreme care being taken with them. Some twelve thousand were taken to McHenry by Messrs. D. McLean and D. W. Fraker the same night they were received here. Capt. P. A. Chisholm also met the train bringing the fish, receiving therefrom several thousand which he deposited in the Wilson lake adjoining Oakland.

Church Officers Elected.

Last Sunday evening at the close of the regular services in St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church a congregational meeting was held at which officers for the ensuing church year were elected. Eighteen members of the church were placed in nomination for the six offices to be filled, namely three elders and three deacons. As elders Messrs. M. R. Hamill, Daniel Hinebaugh and Dr. M. C. Hinebaugh were chosen. For deacons Messrs. Henry Lauer, Blaine Geissman and James A. Sincell were elected. These officials will be formally installed on next Sunday morning.

PRIZE AWARDED PROF. J. C. BEAHM

Committee Decides In His Favor in Contest Conducted by Teachers' Association.

The committee chosen by the Garrett County Teachers' Association to pass upon the merits of the many excellent papers written upon educational subjects by the teachers of the county and published in these columns during the past winter, completed its labors on last Saturday and awarded the prize offerred by the Association to Prof. J. C. Beahm, principal of the Accident School, who contributed article number eight of the series, the author's subject being "The Function of Books."

Miss Mattaae Riley, teacher at Friendsville school, who resides at Selbysport, received second honors for her contribution, it being number six of the series, entitled "A Field of Conquest."

The committee making the award was composed of Revs. George C. Shaw, rector of St. Matthew's Parish of Oakland, and J. B. Workman, pastor of St. Paul's M. E. church, and Hon. U. G. Palmer, ex-County School Superintendent. The labors of the committee were of a nature as to require thoughtful and painstaking discrimination as in nearly every papor submitted there were many thoughts advanced by the respective writers and new ideas brought to the surface not theretofore advanced by educators.

Prof. Beahm's paper, by request of President Rathbun of the Teachers' Association, is reproduced herewith it being deemed well worthy a second reading by the puplic generally:

"School text books should be servants; to the teachers of Garrett county they are too often masters. It is a lamentable fact that pupils, and sometimes teachers, are so tied to books during recitations that only a very low degree of success is attained in many schools. We teachers must realize we are traveling a beaten road; then we should face about to direct the propelling powers of the vehicle and thus lift the wheels from the ruts which have so long retarded our progress. Though the path be old it may become one of great delight, if we pull out of the beaten track, for then we shall find new flowers, and even the old ones will present new beauties and bring us joys.

"May I briefly present two pictures? The one shall be of a school in a rut, the other of a school which has pulled out of the beaten tracks.

"If the teacher spends her evenings reading poor, though fascinating literature, or entertain some friend, or attend a neighborhood party, then retires at a late hour, she will get up late, get to school late, call up her classes late, then follows a pathetic scene—a dull teacher, with a dull look, before a dull class, all of which conspires to make a dull recitation. Should she fall upon a proper question to some pupil, who is servant to the text book, he will turn to the book, and answer satisfactorily, of course, though only to be forgotten the next minute. If a less tactful student is called upon, he will likely be prompted by his kind neighbor. Such conditions are lamentable indeed, and mark the point at which school life is a positive evil.

"In the second picture we see a teacher who loves her work and is not satisfied until she has the consciousness that the pupils are making hearty, solid progress in the formation of habit and character. She rapidly, though intelligently, reviews her next day's lessons each evening. The next morning she has great physical strength and mental vigor. These, with her moral courage, are at once, though in an unconscious way, transmitted to the school. The classes are called promptly, and the scene is at once joyous! The teacher has nothing in her hand expect perhaps, a pencil, surely not a book. The pupils just as free handed, each telling what he can in his own way, showing that he has used the book at the proper time for using books—before recitation. Thus the teacher guides the pupil in developing mental strength and skill rather than looking superficially for facts. Such conditions are scenes over which angels might rejoice!

"Now fellow teachers, the first picture presents a teacher who does not care for her school; the second one, a teacher who loves her work. The first is drifting down stream; the second is propelling the boat against the tide.

"It will require some effort to break away from using books during recitations, but you try it. Of course there are exceptions, but your rule should by to stand before your class without a book. Look at your pupils and have them look at you; soon there will be a system of wireless telegraphy—an exchange of thought and spirit—and the busy life becomes the panacea of many schoolroom ills."

CEDED TO WEST VA. CONFERENCE

Official Action Taken by Baltimore Conference With Respect to Appointments.

At the annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church of the Baltimore Conference held in Cumberland last week, adjourning on Monday afternoon last, the joint commission consisting of Revs. R. B. Ward, C. B. Graham, L. B. Roberts, J. J. Robinson and C. H. Lakin, of the West Virginia Conference, and Revs. M. F. B. Rice, W. W. Barnes, W. A. Koontz C. H. Richardson and John Edwards, of the Baltimore Conference, to adjust the controversy between the Baltimore and West Virginia Conferences regarding the occupancy of certain territory within the geographical boundary of the former, reported that a meeting was held at Mountain Lake Park. It developed that Grantsville is within the bounds of the West Virginia conference except the Mt. Zion appointment, which was given to the West Virginia conference by mutual arrangement nearly thirty years ago. The West Virginia conference conceded that Swanton, Blaine, Gormania and Bayard are within the limits of the Baltimore conference "but that the work had been taken up and developed by the West Virginia conference, and had it not done so the two conferences would have nothing to contend for along that part of the Western Maryland railroad. To disturb the existing relations of that work to the West Virginia conference would not improve the condition of the work itself and would seriously embarass the work in the Oakland district of the West Virginia conference. It was finally determined that the boundary be so changed as to include the churches and congregations now in the Bayard, Blaine, Gormania, Grantsville and Swanton circuits within the West Virginia conference.

The report of the committee on Mountain Lake Park Students conferences pledges the support of the conference to the project. More than thirty college presidents have accepted places on the advisory board of the conference.

THE DEATH RECORD.

HARVEY PRENTISS.

At Hotel Lowenstein, Oakland, last Saturday night, of pleuro-pneumonia, after an illness of a few days, Harvey, aged five years, son of Mr. and Mrs. John C. Prentiss, of Chester, Pa., to which city the body was taken on Sunday night for interment. Mr. and Mrs. Prentiss came to Oakland two weeks ago for the purpose of spending the spring and summer here, but the death of their little one has necessarily changed their plans and they have returned to their home at Chester. Mr. Prentiss is well known to the business men of this section; he being a travelling salesman for a wholesale concern.

FRANK WHITEHAIR

Died, at his home two miles east of Swallow Falls, on Monday, April 8th, 1907, Frank Whitehair, aged sixty years. The deceased was an ex-Union soldier.

JESSE KING.

Died, at his home in Election District No. 8, on last Sunday morning, of diseases incident to extreme age, Jesse King, aged nearly ninety years. The deceased was a life-long resident of Garrett county and one of her most successful farmers. His wife preceded him to the grave a few weeks ago. His funeral took place Tuesday.

MISS KATHARINE JOSEPHINE STANTON.

At the City Hospital, Baltimore, Wednesday morning, April 10th, 1907, of Bright's disease, Miss Katharine Josephine Stanton, aged forty eight years. The deceased was the eldest of the late Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Stanton, of Oakland, both of whom died several years ago. For many years Miss Stanton has been the housekeeper for her brother, Rev. Father Thomas J. Stanton, first at Lonaconing and later in Baltimore, to which city Father Stanton was transferred a few years ago. Miss Stanton's death was wholly unexpected, she being taken ill on Thursday of last week and the day following, owing to her serious condition, she was taken to the hospital. Her remains will arrive in Oakland this afternoon on train No. 55 and tomorrow morning her funeral will occur from St. Peter's Catholic church at ten o'clock, when Rev. Stanton will officiate at a High Requiem Mass. The deceased lady was well known in Oakland where she lived the greater portion of her life until she went with her brother in the capacity of housekeeper when he entered the priesthood.

THE STAKE WAS DRIVEN LAST SATURDAY MORNING

Marking Spot Where First Attempt to Find Oil in Garrett Will Be Made.

Last Saturday morning in the presence of more than fifty persons who had assembled to witness the event, Mr. Chauncey Kimmell, vice president of the Yough River Oil and Gas Company, drove the stake marking the spot where the first attempt to find oil or gas in Garrett county will be made.

The place selected by the parties interested in the development of the hidden treasures of the earth is located on the farm of Mr. John Harned five miles west of Oakland and within a hundred yards of that gentleman's residence.

At the time the stake was driven Mr. J. W. Alderton, of Mountain Lake Park, general manager for the company, was also present along with a photograph, who made a snap-shot of the crowd.

Much of the material for the derrick and engine house has already been placed on the ground and one car load of tools and machinery has been received at Hutton and hauled to the place where operations will begin as soon as the derrick and other structures are erected, work upon which will probably begin yet this week.

Letter to D. M Mason.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: If we sell Devoe to paint your town, your road won't have so much freight to handle.

It takes 10 gallons to paint a fair-size house, and that house won't want painting again for 5 or 10 years. That's true in a way; but people, you know, rather like fresh paint, and they paint for nothing but looks sometimes.

That house would take 12 or 13 gallons of almost any other paint than Devoe, and would have to be painted again in half that time. Ten years is a very long time for a paint to wear: and five isn't short.

Which makes the most freight, a 10 or 20-gallon paint? 5 or 10-year paint? But the 10-gallon paint is the 10-year paint; and the 20-gallon paint is the 5-year paint. Which makes the most freight?

Ask your paint-dealer which he'd rather sell, and which he could sell most of. Ask your painter which he'd rather paint; whether good or bad paint is good for his business; which is good paint, the 10 or 15-gallon paint; which pays most freight, and which pays most wages. Which will you buy yourself, the 10-gallon 10-year, or 20-gallon 5-year, paint?

Yours truly,

21 F. W. DEVOE & CO.

Dixon & Kelso, Oakland and C. M. Rathbun & Sons, Mountain Lake Park, sell our paint.

TWO GOVERNORS WILL BE PRESENT.

Warfield of Maryland, and Dawson of West Virginia, To Be At the Park.

Governor Edwin Warfield of Maryland, and Governor William M. O. Dawson of West Virginia, have accepted invitations to be present at the Chautauqua at Mountain Lake Park on August 1st, of the present year, when the Silver Jubillee, celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary since the establishment of the Park and the Mountain Chautauqua at that point.

Besides the two distinguished gentlemen above named others of more or less national reputation as public men, will also be present upon the date named. The celebration promises to be a most interesting event and large crowds of people from all sections of the country are expected to be present.

FAIR VIEW.

Not seeing any items from this place for some time I will write a few.

Mrs. Frank Broadwater, a highly respected lady of this place, passed into the spirited world on the 29th ult. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. J. T. Green at the Fair View church. She leaves a husband and five children and a host of friends to mourn their lost.

Mrs. Jonas Weitzell was called to the bed side of her mother at Westernport, who is very ill at this writing.

Mrs. Ashford Warnick, who has been confined to her bed for some time, we are glad to know, is slowly recovering.

Mr. Truman Bittinger was seen on our street Sunday last.

Mr. Arthur Warnick and sister Bertha have been employed as cooks for Bu Bois and Bond Bros.

Mr. Lou Garlitz, of Bond, was a very pleasant caller at Mr. Ashford Warnick's last Saturday night.

There will be a series of meetings held at the Fair View church by Rev. McCoy, beginning the 8th inst.

Mr. John Weitzell and sister, Oma, were callers at Mr. Frank Broadwater last Sunday evening.

Mr. Henry Merrill and Miss Cora Miller contemplate a trip to Jamestown in the near future.

Mr. Harrison Bittinger and Miss Jane Broadwater were seen on our streets last Sunday.

Mr. John Sibert has rented the J. W. Broadwater farm for the coming season and has purchased all the latest improved machinery.

Mr. Hampton Butler is all smiles—it's a girl.

Mr. Lou Warnick, who has been farming for D. L. Merrill has abandoned his position.

Miss Anna Broadwater, of Avilton, is vising friends here.

Miss Jane Ross has been employed by Mr. Frank Broadwater for the summer.

God Gives Jacob a New Name.

There was a clash of feeling in the heart of Jacob as he approached Canaan after his exile in Padanaram. There was joy! Before him lay the land "promised" to him—a land flowing with milk and honey. And he was making his entrance in good form. He returned not as he went out, with merely a staff in his hand. He came as a mighty sheik, who could look complacently at his vast flocks and herds, and the caravan of his followers, with all the impedimenta of a great camp. Nor were his thoughts wholly upon temporalities. He had learned many religious lessons in his banishment. He came with the intention of discharging well the priestly function inhering in his headship of the nation. He had some conception, however incomplete, of One who was to be born of his line, a Prince and a Savior. He had the Messianic hope. . . . But all the brightness of Jacob's joy was darkened by one cloud of angry portent. He must needs meet the consequences of the sins of forty years ago—his unbrotherly action; his ambition, greed, and fraud; his overhaste and use of foul means to accomplish what he had reason to believe was the Lord's will—all of these assumed a spectral form to haunt him. His wronged brother was approaching in hostile mien and force. Esau was accustomed to nothing else but striking the blow of death. . . . To Jacob it seemed as if all was lost. What did it amount to—the sight of the Promised Land—if he must needs stain its border with his life's blood? And all the Messianic hopes and promises would perish in him. There is a touch of the domestic and affectionate spirit of the patriarch in his prayer. He fairly screens his eyes from sight of the impending slaughter of the innocents. He can not brook the thought of another tragedy of a Niobe and her children. . . . In the extremity of his peril, the ruling passion, the strategic spirit of Jacob asserted itself. But the advance in character is manifest in that it took no ignoble form. There was nothing unworthy in the division of his caravan into two bands. The advantage of it was, that if one was taken, the other might be left. And the presents sent in a series would be cumulative in their effect to soften the anger of his injured brother. . . . Having done all that human tact could suggest, Jacob had recourse to prayer. Some one once asked a minister whether he believed in healing by faith or medicine. His very apt reply was: "I believe in healing by faith and medicine." Jacob used all the expedients he could think of to placate his brother and save himself and his family, just as if everything depended upon himself. Then he went to prayer, just as if everything depended upon God. . . . The prayer of Jacob is the first recorded prayer, as it is one of the noblest of all in the Bible. "O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac!" Here is an appeal to the God of the covenant. The entrance of a pathetic claim to the mercies of the covenant. "Which saidest unto me, Return." The present extreme peril is not incurred by any presumption or rashnsss on Jacob's part; but by his very obedience to the explicit command of God. "I am not worthy." This is deprecation. "Deliver me." This is supplication. "And thou saidst, I will surely do thee good." This is an appeal to, and a pressing of, the promises of God. . . . Nature seems at that particular spot to be in strange harmony with the scene that transpired there. The brook Jabbok—the very name signifying "wrestler"—there huris itself against the flinty barriers in its path, and force a passage to the quiet pool beyond. So the indomitable spirit of the patriarch there stormed the kingdom of heaven, and took it by force. Jacob was in an agony. Death was impending, his hopes ruined, his fortune scattered; he was in extremity. God's eye must pity, God's arm must bring deliverance. . . . There is nothing inexplicable in the wrestling scene, commonly thought to be so mysterious. It was a merciful concession when the Lord took upon Himself a human form, and allowed Jacob to vent his excessive griet and anxiety in the way of physical exertion. The corporeal struggle was an accompaniment to prayer. The prophet Hosea says Jacob wept and made supplication to the angel. Back of the wrestling, and in and through it, there was an intelligent mind, a fervent heart, and importunate spirit. Many persons of ardent temperament, or placed in desperate situations, still accompany their prayers with bodily exertion, in violent gestures or loud tone of voice, or grip upon chair or bench or other article of furniture. . . . Yet Jacob was to be taught that the Lord's stength was made perfect in weakness—that it is not by (human) might nor power, but by God's Spirit; so the very seat and citadel of his physical might, his thigh, was miraculously "touched," and he bent like a broken straw. But even then he threw his arms about the angel's neck and hung upon him. . . . The angel might as well have asked Jacob what his former character had been as to ask his name; for name and character were synonymous. He was Jacob the supplanter, the trickster, the heel-holder, and tripper, gaining his ends by foul means if fair would not answer. The angel in that very question held up the mirror before Jacob, so that he saw plainly the ugly traits of his character. He despised himself. He was sorry for, and wanted to be rid of, his old self. He was ready to cry, Who shall deliver me from the body of this death? He got a new name and nature simultaneously. . . . The angel's answer to Jacob's demand was equivalent to saying, "You know my name already; why do you ask for it?" Jacob showed that he knew the name when he called the place Peniel, "Face of God."

Analysis and Key.

1. Jacob's mixed feeling on return to Canaan.
   Contrasts of exit and entrance.
   Joy and fear.
2. The gains of the exile indicated in Jacob's conduct.
3. Facing the consequences of conduct.
   Approach of Esau, the avenger.
   Jacob's strategem not ignoble as before.
4. Recourse to prayer.
   First recorded prayer of the Bible.
   One of the noblest—analysis of it.
5. The "Wrestling" a merciful condescension.
6. Signficance of old name and new.

The Teacher's Lantern.

The lesson of this thrilling scene is the same that Jesus sought to impress by the parables of the "Widow and the Unjust Judge," and the "Borrowing Neighbor." As the widow kept urging her suit, and the neighbor kept knocking, so Jacob kept crying: "I will not let Thee go except Thou bless me." There must be moral earnestness, which discovers itself to itself and to others, before God will bless. As one has said, the arrow which is to pierce the sky must part from the bent bow and strained arm.

* * * * *

Grace is gradual. The full stature is attained by daily accretions of faith, prayer and service. But there are also periods in which, by an uncommon concentration of thought and effort, phenomenal progress may be made. That is the meaning of Jacob'a experience on the bank of the foaming Jabbok. Jacob had grown much in grace since he saw the ladder of Bethel forty years before. But in that one night of importunate prayer he made a surprising advance. He was knighted, lifted to the only true and imperishable royally. He became a prince.

* * * * *

A candidate was created a knight by the king, who struck the person kneeling with the flat of a sword upon his back, exclaiming, "Rise, Sir ——!" The blow which Jacob received was no light accolade. It crippled. But as he passed over Peniel, halting on his thigh, the sun shone on a prince, an Israelite indeed, out of whom the guile had been taken.

* * * * *

Orthodox Jews to this day religously abstain from eating the nerve that fastens the thigh-bone in its socket. That particular muscle is carefully extracted at the Hebrew abattoir. This is a traditional usage, serving to remind the eater of Jacob's wrestling-match. There is no law for it. It sprang from the awe of the member in which the patriarch was wounded and is a collateral evidence of the reality of the circumstance.

* * * * *

He prevailed not against him. The Almighiy often fails yet in His wrestling with the stubborn wills of men. There is an ultimate element of selfhood in man that can and does successfully assert itself against God. There is a central citadel of our being which Omnipotence never storms, and, as we are constituted, can not successfully assault. The terms of Jesus' message are yet, "If any man will [is willing, consents, agrees to it] be My disciple, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me."

For Rent.

By Constance D'Arcy Mackay.

Copyright, 1907, by T. C. Parcells.

"Be sure it has six light rooms, all outside," abjured Grace.

"And remember it must be in a nice neighborhood," added Molly.

Rowena sighed. "I'll try," she said resignedly and, tucking her umbrella under her arm, started down the stairs. It was a cool day, with a gray sky and a promise of rain in the air. The streets and boulevards had the faded, dusty look that late summer always wears before the first frost arrives to sharpen and brighten things. Vans laden with furniture passed with a frequency which proclaimed that moving time had come.

"I must remember that all places look less cheerful on a dull day," said Rowena to herself, taking a list out of her pocketbook and running over it with a ruminating eye.

"'Bright, attractive apartment, six rooms and bath.' I think I'll try that one, though they all advertise them as attractive, and the reality is a lot of stuffy little rooms overlooking an air shaft on one side and somebody's back yard on the other. But I'm starting awfully early in the season, and that ought to give me a better choice."

For a week Rowena had been flat hunting, climbing endless flights of stairs and interviewing a seemingly endless line of real estate agents and janitors. Each morning she set out blithely, and each evening she came back fatigued and disheartened. "The price we want to pay and the kind of an apartment we would like don't seem to fit together," she wailed, recounting her adventures to Molly and Grace at nightfall. And this particular day proved no exception to the rule. By 11 o'clock in the morning she had tramped miles and found nothing suitable.

"Is this the Edgemere?" she wearily inquired of an elevator boy in an apartment building whose marble entrance and artistic green walls were like a ray of hope to her dejected spirits.

"Yes'm," said he of the trim suit and brass buttons.

"I'd like to look at one on the third floor," said Rowena, smiling on him. Rowena's smile was one of her chief charms. It lighted up her piquant face and showed a dimple lurking in her cheek. It would captivate any one from a king to an elevator boy.

The third floor of the Edgemere proved desirable from every point of view. Rowena was delighted. "And all for $50 a month," she breathed.

The boy gaped at her. "Fifty dollars!" he scoffed. "Why, these here apartments rents for a hundred and fifty!"

"One hundred and fifty! You're certainly mistaken. The paper said"—She opened her pocketbook, found the clipping and showed it to him. He shook his head.

"Misprint, lady," he answered. "They ain't no such price."

"Sure, that's just what I've been telling this gentleman," said a neat looking scrubwoman, suddenly appearing in the doorway. Behind her towered a fair haired young fellow, broad of shoulder and firm of chin. He stared at Rowena for an instant.

"Why, Miss Holden," he cried, with a boyish laugh of pleasure, "are you on the trail too?"

"I should think you'd know it at first glance," said Rowena tragically. "My sisters tell me that my face has taken on the expression of the New York flat hunter—a look of grim despair that is unmistakable."

Dwight Curtis laughed again.

"I wonder if your trials are as great as mine. I'm clubbing together with two other fellows, and trying to fill the wants of each and all is turning me gray. Moreover, I feel I'm getting the rickets from sprinting up so many flights of stairs."

"The building we're in now is going to be torn down, so we have to move, and it's my turn to search," explained Rowena. "And, oh, Mr. Curtis, have you seen any reasonable apartments with light, airy rooms in a pleasant neighborhood not too far from the car line?"

"I have not," Dwight answered gravely, "though I repeat those phrases even in my sleep. I tell you what—why can't we hunt together? It will be a lot more sociable, and two heads are better than one, you know. Besides, down at the beach this summer that Hawkins man monopolized so much of your time that it's only fair for me to have my innings now. Shall we go to Seventy-sixth street next?"

"Do you realize," said Rowena a week later as they sat on a bench on Riverside drive, "that time is flying and we've found nothing—absolutely nothing—so far?"

"But we've had a lot of fun," Dwight replied, smiling reminiscently as he thought of sundry strolls they had taken in the park, sundry luncheons tete-a-tete in the little casino, sundry car rides to perfectly irrelevant places, and all with the ostensible excuse of flat hunting.

"This is good enough for me," he went on, with a look first at Rowena and then at the river, where myriads of water craft plied up and down. Steam launches puffed portentously, sailboats gleamed in the sunlight, and an excursion steamer churned past, all flag flying and a band playing lustily on deck. The rows of stone houses facing the drive were closed and silent, the lower windows boarded up, while the half shut blinds of the upper ones gave them a semblance of supercilious drooping eyelids.

Rowena toyed with her parasol. She was looking dangerously demure in pale blue. A tip tilted, coquettish hat sat lightly on her well poised head.

"I feel like a perfect culprit when I return at night," she confessed. "The girls fuss over me and say what a hard day I must have been through."

"I know," echoed Dwight, grinning sympathetically. "The fellows tell me that I'm a brick and that they're no end grateful, while as it is I'm having the time of my life! Must we really go?" he pleaded as Rowena abruptly gathered up her gloves and parasol.

"I simply must decide on something today," she said, a ring of determination in her voice. "I cannot put it off any longer."

"Let's try this, then," suggested Dwight, looking up at a white stone building on a side street. "This is 29. It looks pretty spick and span, doesn't it? I have an idea that it will do."

Rowena gave a regretful shake of the head.

"It's too small," she declared, glancing about at the little drawing room. "But, oh, what a darling! It's the loveliest one we've seen anywhere! With a little money and a little taste it could be made a perfect jewel box. How the sun streams in, and how dear and cozy this drawing room would be!"

"With a window seat there," said Dwight, "and a bookcase against the wall."

"And some pictures and bits of bric-a-brac on the mantel!" Rowena glowed with enthusiasm.

"And a low round table and a reading lamp," added Dwight delightedly.

The voice of the ever present janitress broke in on them. "I think you'd like it," she observed. "It's just the place for young married couples."

Rowena gasped and retreated. Dwight followed.

"Dear," he besought, "you know it's exactly as she says—it's meant for us and no one else. Ah, Rowena, won't you say that the light which shines through these windows will be our home light? Won't you say that every night at dinner time the woman I love will be waiting here to welcome me? Won't you say"—and there was mirth in his voice as well as tenderness—"won't you say that our flat hunting is over?"

Rowena hesitated.

"I don't know," she began demurely. "I hadn't meant to lease my heart so soon, but since—since so desirable a tenant has applied it seems only right to oblige him with a permanent occupancy, provided he keeps it in good repair!"

Pullman's Giant Passenger.

There was one story of his career that Mr. Pullman used to tell with manifest delight. One night, going out of Chicago, a long, lean, ugly man, with a wart on his cheek, came into the depot. He paid George M. Pullman 50 cents, and half a berth was assigned him. Then he kicked off his boots, which were of surprising length, turned into the berth and, having an easy conscience, was sleeping like a healthy baby before the car left the depot. Along came another passenger and paid his 50 cents. In two minutes he was back at George Pullman.

"There's a man in that berth of mine," said he hotly, "and he's about ten feet high. How am I going to sleep there, I'd like to know? Go and look at him."

In went Pullman—mad too. The tall, lank man's knees were under his chin, his arms were stretched across the bed, and his feet were stored comfortably—for him. Pullman shook him until he awoke and then told him if he wanted the whole berth he would have to pay $1.

"My dear sir," said the tall man, "a contract is a contract. I have paid you 50 cents for half this berth, and, as you see, I am occupying it. There's the other half," pointing to a strip about six inches wide. "Sell that and don't disturb me again." And, so saying, the man with the wart on his face went to sleep again. He was Abraham Lincoln.

Yellowstone Park.

The Yellowstone National park covers an area of 3,348 square miles of territory and embraces within its boundaries specimens of almost every kind of natural scenery—waterfalls, rapids, lakes, mountains, boiling springs, mud volcanoes, geysers, canyons, caves, basaltic terraces and giant bowlders worn by erosion into every manner and kind of queer and fantastic shape that the imagination can conceive of. The Yellowstone is at present by far and away the largest park in the world.

NUGGETS OF SOUND SENSE.

Beware of the Entering Wedge of Socialism—Public Ownership.

In recording the defeat of a municipal waterworks scheme in Raleigh, N. C., after an educational campaign of several months' duration, the Evening Times of that city gives an analysis of municipal ownership which is well worth the careful study of all who have at heart the welfare of their cities. Omitting references to local conditions, the editorial reads as follows:

"Municipal ownership is contrary to the fundamental doctrines of the Democratic party, which opposes centralized parental government and cries out for the freedom of individuals. The function of the government is to govern, regulate and execute the laws made by the people and not to engage in trading and trafficking for speculative gain. The miserable failure which the state, backed by all its power and public treasury, made in the trading business while it owned and operated plank roads, canals and railroads is a blatant warning against municipal ownership.

"Municipal ownership is the first step in socialism, which strangles individual enterprise, deters the investment of capital in our city and retards industrial progress. When once started there is no limit to its scope until there becomes a large increase in municipal debt and taxes and an impairment of municipal credit. When a city engages in municipal ownership it runs the risk of constant suits for damages, while the state and county are deprived of taxes upon that much property.

"While many towns owning waterworks publish rates which appear to be cheap, they are in many instances deceptive for the reasons that, in addition to the rates, taxes are levied upon the people to pay interest on bonds, which when added to the rates make the consumer pay more than the rates charged by private plants. Many of these municipal plants if examined by experts according to the business rules of examining the affairs of private corporations would be proved to be running at a loss instead of a profit, as claimed.

"Under municipal ownership the chance of the laboring man for employment depends not upon his merits, but upon his political influence and pull, and if he is not able to use public water he still has to pay taxes for the benefit of the rich man who does.

"There is no more reason for municipal ownership of water than there is for butcher shops, bakeries, clothing stores, drug stores, livery stables, etc., and under the system of municipal government in this country it is a fertile source of graft, political corruption and bossism, a catchy slogan for a political campaign, a slick article with which to deceive the people and on which to ride into office and a machine to perpetuate the control of the boss. It has been aptly called 'that vivid saffron gold brick,' under whose glittering tinsel lurks a delusion and a snare.

"Municipal ownership is dead! Long live good common business sense!"

It is a curious fact that the board of aldermen which voted unanimously to renew the water franchise was elected on a municipal ownership ticket. Facts beat fancies if they have a fair chance.

Pernicious Partisan Activity.

Nothing is more certain than that public ownership multiplies the possibilities of pernicious partisan activity. Employees of the postoffice department defeated Representative Loud of California because of some stand he took in congress relative to their desires. This is an indication of what might be expected under public ownership, both in city and nation.

Strong men at the head of municipal employees in street cars, parks, paving, waterworks and lighting service could swing any election they might desire to control. Officials would be paralyzed as to their duties to the public through the necessity of placating or humoring these immense bodies of municipal employees. Then we should have the leaders of the aggregation making bargains with heavy interests for the delivery of votes to desired candidates or measures. Self interest, more or less corrupt, would supersede the disinterested patriotic motives and differences of opinion on which men now divide in local and general elections.—Terre Haute Star.

Duluth, Minn.

At a recent meeting of the city council a resolution was passed authorizing the water board to make a contract with the Great Northern Power company to furnish electricity for operating the pumping station. Under the proposed contract the maximum price for pumping 1,000,000 gallons is $6.50. Last year it cost the city $8.90 per 1,000,000 gallons, without counting the cost of depreciation in the plant.—Electrical World.

A Ray of Light From England.

Municipal indebtedness resulting from taking over public service utilities has become so burdensome in England that it is seriously suggested to avoid payment of interest by redeeming the bonds with noninterest bearing municipal notes. While this plan has not yet been approved by English financiers and statesmen, it may afford a ray of hope to some of our cities that are staggering under similar burdens.

Down In Dixie.

The project to establish a municipal electric light plant was [illegible] by the board of aldermen of Lynchburg, Va., on the recommendation of a special committee appointed to investigate the matter.

In Natchez, Miss., the citizens voted down a similar proposition.

FARM AND GARDEN

THE HOTBED.

Proper Location to Select—Method of Construction.

The hotbed should be located if possible in some sheltered place either on the south side of a building or on the southern or southeastern slope of a hill. The soil and subsoil where it is to stand should be naturally or artificially well drained. Hotbeds may be made of any reasonable length, but should correspond with the number of sash to be used. The common and very convenient size of sash is 3 by 6 feet. These may be purchased ready made or constructed at home, as is desired. Where the hotbed is to supply the wants of the family only three sash will be sufficient. This will provide for a hotbed 6 by 9 feet or fifty-four square feet in extent.

Before beginning the construction of the frame the soil should be excavated where it is to stand eighteen inches deep and two feet wider and longer than the outside measurements of the frame. Four by four inch pieces of wood may be used for posts, to which planks should be nailed on the sides and ends. The height of the frame should be about two feet in front and three feet on the back, eighteen inches of each side being below the surface of the ground. After the frame is put in place the earth should be firmly compacted around it, and it is well to have the surface of the soil slope away from the frame to provide for surface drainage.

About ten days or two weeks before it is desired to sow the seed in the hotbed the required amount of fresh horse manure, to which has been added one-third of its bulk of straw or leaves, should be heaped in a compact pile. If the manure is not uniformly wet, a little water may be added, but not enough to make it soggy. The manure will show signs of fermenting, generally known as heating, in a few days, when it should be forked over, thoroughly mixed and made into a compact heap again. After another interval of three or four days the manure is ready to be placed in the frame. As it is put in it should be compacted with a fork and by tramping. In order that the manure may be one foot deep after it has had time to settle it should be about fourteen or fifteen inches deep when first put in.

The best soil to use is a compost, such as is used in greenhouses and which consists of two-thirds sods and one-third manure well composted. Any good garden soil will do, however, if a composted soil is not available, says American Agriculturist. The depth of the soil should be about four or five inches.

The sash should be put in place at once after the dirt is put in the frame, but the seeds should not be sown for three or four days or until the temperature of the soil is at about 70 degrees. The sowing of the seed, thinning of the plants, stirring of the soil and general care should be about the same as for the same crops when sown in beds in the garden.

Watering and ventilating are the most particular operations. Water should not be applied except in the morning and on bright days. It should be at about the temperature of the soil. The purpose of ventilation is to assist in controlling the temperature and humidity of the air within the hotbed, and it should be governed by the conditions both outside and inside of the hotbed. A small opening will allow much heat to escape; therefore one sash pulled down two or three inches from the top or lifted and a stick placed under it will be sufficient ventilation for a three sashed hotbed on cold days.

Asparagus Crop.

Rich or well enriched, warm, well drained land is the first condition of success. If you have that and plant strong one-year-old plants in any manner, provided they have room enough and can be well cultivated and annually fed with a coat of old manure or with any good complete fertilizer or "vegetable manure" or with wood ashes, bone or superphosphate and nitrate of soda, you are liable to get a crop. The plant is rugged and enduring hardy.—Farm and Fireside.

The Early Onions.

For the earliest supply of onions grown for the home table or bunching for market, sets are used, and these should be planted in rich soil. Seed may also be sown at the same time for plants to follow and maintain the supply. Sets of the white onions are put out as early as the ground can be worked in the spring three inches apart in rows one foot apart and will be large enough for pulling about the middle of June.

BUILD A GREAT HIGHWAY.

Maryland has begun building good roads, and the people want more, says the Baltimore American, always a strenuous advocate of improved highways: "The work done under the Shoemaker law and under direction of the commission has been in the highest degree commendable. Nearly every county of the state has declared its intention to share in the benefits thus secured, and during the present spring there promises to be greater activity in road construction than was ever known before in the history of the state. Many thousands of dollars will be expended in these all-important public improvements, and there is hope that within a few years Maryland will be honeycombed with roads built on the most modern and approved methods, making travel upon them a pleasure at all seasons of the year. The last legislature authorized the construction of a first-class, modern highway between Baltimore and Washington. Funds for this improvement were provided and the work is now well under way. This is all well and good, but Maryland must do more. It must extend that great highway through its eastern counties in the direction of Philadelphia, thus making it an important link in a magnificent route between the North and the South. This is all the more important, as a movement is already on foot to build such a highway between Washington and Richmond, then to extend it to Atlanta and further South, even to Florida and the Gulf. The new highway should go by the shore road via Havre de Grace, Elkton and Wilmington. The value of such a road cannot be overestimated. Not only will it prove a blessing to the farmers of several of the important counties of Maryland, not only will it increase the value of all property nearing it, but it will put Baltimore in the very heart of the touring route between the North and the South."

THE WASTE BASKET.

An exchange puts it this way: If some day the newspaper man should print the contents of his waste basket there would probably be a riot. There would certainly be trouble in many homes, arrests in some directions, shot guns in others, trouble all around. But the patron never sees the waste basket. He only glances at the beautifully printed pages, complains if one letter in fifty is upside down, growls his disappointment if one name in five hundred has happened to go wrong, kicks because his communication, signed "Tax Payer" has been condensed into respectable English, frowns because the editor didn't take his advice about publicly warning his neighbor against throwing more melons in the ally, and is generally disgrunted, not so much at what he fails to find. He knows his share of the waste basket, but if he could have one look at the contributions made to that receptacle by his neighbors and friends, he would thank God for the existence of a man with sufficient intelligence and courage not to print all he knows, and to temper even that which he does print.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S POPULARITY.

The canvass that is being made by the New York Times, by means of a circular letter addressed to Republican editors throughout the country, to ascertain the state of popular feeling in regard to President Roosevelt, is hardly necessary for the purpose. The result of that canvass, as indicated by the replies already received, will perhaps be to add some emphasis, or some increase of certainty, to a belief which, without it, must be entertained by everybody whose eyes and ears are open. Mr. Roosevelt's popularity is, both in scope and in intensity, beyond anything that has been witnessed in the last two generations, if indeed it has any parallel at all in the history of the country. Time after time, incidents have arisen which were hailed by his critics as ushering in a reaction; time after time he has come out of them with popularity absolutely unimpared, and even with prestige increased. To attach importance, as indications of his future, to the ups and downs in his affairs, that have sprung from clashes and incidents in the prosecution of his various policies has been like basing predictions of recedence in an advancing tide upon observation of the backward and forward swirling of the surf. Mr. Roosevelt has gained in an extraordinary degree the confidence and the admiration of the great mass of the American people, and no event of ordinary dimensions, nor any error of ordinary character in his own conduct, will suffice to make any appreciable impression on that feeling.

His possession of the popular heart is due primarily to his own personal qualities, but it has been enormously strengthened by the feeling entertained by the people toward those who, in the past year or two, have become more and more identified in the minds of the people with the idea of hostility to the President. When a question arises between Roosevelt and Harriman, or Roosevelt and Rockefeller, or Roosevelt and Morgan, the anti-Roosevelt party to the controversy is sure to get short shrift in the forum of popular opinion. The tide is running high against the financial magnates, and if the Roosevelt tide runs the same way, small wonder that anything that gets into its path is swept away with promptness and dispatch. But that is not all. In the more recent development of politics a sharp line has become apparent between the machine politicians in the various States on the one hand and the Roosevelt forces on the other. This was not always so. As far as his own direct activity went, Mr. Roosevelt has, of course, throughout his career, been a force for the advancement of good government; but this has not been held by him incompatible with a pretty friendly association with some of the most rascally of political bosses. Time was when—without express authorization, to be sure—Roosevelt was counted on the side of Quay in Pennsylvania, and when it was even felt that he lent a certain amount of moral support to Addicks in Delaware. Gradually as his second term has progressed, an alignment has been forming in which the corrupt State machines are on one side and Roosevelt and his friends on the other. In the news dispatches of a single day—this very day—we find in conspicuous evidence the hostility of Odell in New York, of Penrose and Reyburn in Pennsylvania, of Foraker in Ohio, and of the old Republican machine in New Jersey. Strengthened by such hostility, as well as by the opposition of the railroad and trust magnates, what limit can be assigned to the power of Roosevelt's popularity?

A New Aid Fable.

This is not a George Ade fable, though it may sling some slang. It is a Home Aid fable.

Once there was a Geezer, who sat around and cut Kindling too small for Cook Stove purposes. He Whittled against Time and Flabbergasted against his Town. The town was No Good, he said—strictly on the Blink. Yes, it was N. G. Why, hadn't he lived Here since '84 and found that the Place was Punky? Sure, Mike!

Look at that town over in the next County. Grown like Jonah's Gourd. Must be a Jonah here. We've grown some, but I don't see that we're knocking any particularly Big Persimmons. That's the way this Gazaboo knocked his town.

One day a Sarcastic Stranger floated into the Town that was Knocked from the burg that had Blossomed like Jonah's Gourd. He Heard some of the Flabbergasting and Dropped to the situation.

"Look here, you," he remarked to the citizen who was Handing Out the Knocks. "What do you do for this town? Are you doing your part to put this Burg on the Upgrade? What's that hefty Bunch of literature sticking out of your Clothes?"

"That's a Mail Order Catalogue from Chicago—a town that is a town," replied the Geezer.

"So I thought," said the Impertinent Arrival. "Now let me hand you out a nice little Wad of common sense. For the past ten years you have been sending your money to the Chicago Mail Order houses instead of spending it among your home merchants. What would have happened to Chicago fifty years ago if all the First Settlers had shipped their Loose Coin to New York on catalogue inducements? Why, you'd have to use a sand dredger now to find the Original Site of Chicago. Now, in the Burg from which I have just Blown in we got over all this Bum Business years ago. We passed Resolutions that we would trade at home and help our own town to Spread out so that you could Sight it on the map without using Opera Glasses. But you and a Bunch of other folks in this town have wasted your Substance in Riotous Expenditures in Chicago by mail and let the sheriff hang out the 'Nothing Doing' sign in front of some of your own town's mercantile Emporiums. Look at our Town and then look at yours. What makes the Difference?"

Whereupon the Whittling Gazaboo threw a few well chosen Thoughts into his mental makeup and went down to the village store to Annex a linen collar in place of the Paper Circles which he had bought from Chicago at Two Bits a Box.

MORAL: If you want your town to grow, patronize home enterprises.

BOUGHT HOTEL COLUMBIA.

Mr. Hanson B. Lewis Becomes Owner of Large Hotel at the Park.

Mr. Hanson B. Lewis, for several years one of the leading citizens and business men at Mountain Lake Park, recently purchased from Judge Robert R. Henderson, of Cumberland, Hotel Columbia, one of the largest hostelries in the Park.

The building was erected several years ago and has been unoccupied almost continuously since its completion owing to the lack of finances on the part of the original owner.

The property was lately sold at mortgagee's sale, Judge Henderson becoming the purchaser. Last year Mr. Lewis rented the property and made a most genial host for the many persons who were his guests.

This year Mr. Lewis will put the property in thorough repair and make it homelike for the many visitors who will in all probability be at the Park this summer. His many friends in Oakland wish him success in his new undertaking

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Married, on the platform of the Tabernacle, Mountain Lake Park, Saturday evening last, about 9 o'clock, by Rev. Johnson, of the U. B. Church, Mr. W. C. Reedy and Miss Martha Custer. Mr. Reedy is a telegraph operator here and Miss Custer was a school teacher and has resided here for several years.

Married, at the parsonage, Mountain Lake Park, Monday evening last by Rev. E. J. Westfall, Mr. Robert Miller and Miss Mary Rinker, both of Gorman, Md.

Rev. Drs. C. W. Baldwin and W. W. Davis, president and superintendent respectively of the Mountain Lake Park Association, were here Tuesday last.

Mrs. J. W. Laughlin was called to Grafton Thursday to the bedside of her grand-daughter Helen, who is ill from typhoid fever. Her daughter Miss Sada returned from Grafton Wednesday.

The sad death of young Schell, who was struck by train 55 at the station here Wednesday afternoon, has cast a gloom over the neighborhood. He was a very exemplary young man. This is the fourth death in the family within a few weeks.

Mr. Levi Echard, who has been confined to his home the entire winter, is somewhat better and hopes to go out when good weather comes.

Mr. Thomas Harris, who has been ill for some months, is still confined to his home.

Mr. Hanson Lewis, who recently purchased Hotel Columbia, will thoroughly repair that popular house before the opening of the season.

Judge Sanders is occupying the cottage he recently purchased from Mr. S. Gilpin, on Deer Park drive. The Judge expects to build a residence this summer on a ten-acre tract near Overlook Inn.

Mr. Upton Cuppett is doing a large business this spring in fertilizers and lime.

We understand that Mr. L. P. Carr and family, of Fairmont, W. Va., will be at home in their handsome cottage here next week.

We understand that the "Good" family will occupy the Blake cottage May 1st—coming a month earlier than usual.

Mrs. Taney, of Wheeling, W. Va., expects to occupy her large (Cecil) cottage early in May.

Mr. C. F. Dawson, who has been engaged most of the winter in Fairmont, was with his family over Sunday. While here he contracted for the re-papering and painting the interior of the M. E. church. The work will be done at once.

The Ladies' Aid Society of the M. E. church has purchased new carpets and mattings for the church and also velvet to re-cover the altar chairs. The entire improvement will cost near two hundred dollars.

One of the worst April storms in the memory of the oldest inhabitants has been prevailing here since Sunday. Rain sleet or snow has been constantly in evidence. More than a foot of snow and sleet have fallen during that time, but it has been melting next the ground and the accumulation was at no time more than four inches.

Mr. Lou Prevost, who has attending a veterinary college at Washington, D C., is at home for the summer vacation. Mr. Prevost has one more year of study and then he will be "Dr." Prevost.

SHORT RUN.

The past year has proved very unsuccessful for the farmer. Last fall the apple crop was all frozen and we discover this spring that the most of the young apple trees were killed by the freeze; also the crop of peaches for the coming year. The season for maple sugar has been a very unprofitable one.

The calves this winter have wintered very poorly and seen to be diseased but we don't mean to grumble for we know that God is a merciful God and He has given us more than we deserve.

The mines near here are running good and are giving us a good market for all of our farm products.

The Grange is in a prosperous condition and we find that it helps us socially, educationally, and last, financially.

Mrs. Mary Wilson has the chicken craze. She has gathered $88 worth of eggs from 60 hens during the months of December, January, February, and March.

Miss Emma Harvey's school closed last Friday. She had an entertainment at night with good attendance. The young people reported a good time. She taught the Eagle Rock school.

Miss Blanch Browning is visiting Mrs. Rachel Harvey and her many friends.

Misses Bessie and Alta Reckley are visiting their aunt, Mrs. Sallie Wilson. You ought to see the sweet smiles of the boys.

Judge Dan'l Wilson was visiting his daughter, Mrs. Wm. Kitzmiller, Sunday. He reports a good time.

Mr. Alex Wilson is looking sad. He lost a stick pin which he prized very highly.

Miss Ida Wilson expects to attend Normal this spring. We wish her great success.

Mr. Joe Beals, of Kitzmillerville, got slightly hurt in the mines and is now enjoying the pleasant breezes of the mountains. We hope he will soon recover.

Scott, Claude and Chas. Harvey have purchased a farm over five hundred acres. They expect to go into the sheep business.

Mr. A. E. Harvey is still blacksmithing for the Garrett County Coal Co.

Mr. Harrison Hardesty, of Kurtz Chapel, spent a few days among friends here.

Misses Helen Harvey and Cassie Wilson have been spending several days at Keyser visiting relatives.

Dr. Wm. Moore was a visitor of Mr. Dan'l Wilson Sunday. [How about it, Delca?]

Mr. J. T. Harvey is having quite a lot of trouble with the dogs which are chasing his sheep. He thinks it necessary to have a veterinary near. (Lois think so too.)

OLD WATERWAY OPEN FOR TRADE

Twelve Hundred Tons of Coal the First Shipment Made Out of Cumberland.

The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal was opened for traffic for the season of 1907-8 this week, the first shipment being 1200 tons of coal consigned to Williamsport and Georgetown. It is stated that the waterway never was in as fine condition as it is at present. The boats are nearly all new and spleddidly teamed. The towpath is in fine shape, having been repaired from end to end. The prospects for a busy and profitable season have not been as propitious for years. Under its present management this famous old waterway is assuming some of its old time thrift, a matter of great consideration to Cnmberland, which is its head, as well as to the many towns through which it passes. The cheapness of transportation by water is becoming more and more recognized as an important item among shippers, and the day is not far distant, it is contended, when the artificial waterways of the country will assume the importance they once held before rapid transit by rail took the place of the slow, but sure and cheap delivery by water.

Confirmation Services.

Confirmation and Communion services in the Lutheran church at Friendsville last Sunday evening were interesting. The class met at the parsonage and marched into the church in a body accompanied by the pastor. The processional was played by Mrs. A. J. Mas[illegible] in her usual skillful manner. The following composed the class: Mabel [illegible] Edith Rodger, William East, Leroy and Milton Kamp, John Rumbaugh and Leonory Frazee. The class stood a splendid examination on Luther's catechism, before the congregation. The following were confirmed with the class: Mrs. Chas. Rodgers and Miss Period Steele. Mrs. Fred Kamp was received by transfer; four children were baptized. The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered to a large number of the congregation. An interesting feature of the service was the chanting of the Lord's Prayer by the class. Albert Kolb and Chas. East served as ushers.

April 21, 8 p. m., the special sermon to the confirmation class by the pastor will be delivered, at which time the certificates of confirmation will be conferred and the class will receive a present from the pastor. Next Lord's Day evening at 8 o'clock the 8th sermon on the ten commandments will be deliverd at Friendsville. In the morning at 10, at Cove, the 5th sermon on the ten commandments will be preached. All are welcome.

H. C. SALEM, Pastor.

BITTINGER.

This (Tuesday) morning the earth is slumbering beneath a covering of snow, and the robins that cheered us with their glad voices a few days ago have gone from field and meadow

Young P. Lohr, of Swanton, is passing this week in this community.

Misses Fannie Brennenan and Vernie Shrock were shopping Grantsville last Monday.

John L. Beachy and wife were visiting Mrs. Beachy's brother at Pocahontas, Pa., last week.

Miss Beatrice Hayward and brother Edgar, of Bond, were visiting in this village last week.

Mr. and Mrs. L. Fearer were calling on Miss Amanda Ellithorp last Monday evening.

The public school at this place closed last Friday after a most successful term under the management of W. L. Thom[illegible] and Miss Bessie Wiley.

The musical entertainment given on Thursday evening by the pupils of our school was largely attended and has been pronounced most excellent and pleasing.

Mrs. Peter G. Stark and son George, went to Oakland and Gortner last Satnrday for a short visit to relatives.

Mr. James O. Cleveland, of Oakland, recently lost the sight of his left eye from some unknown cause, the affliction coming upon him almost instantly, since which time he has been unable to distinguish night from day with the affected eye. Mr. Cleveland went to Cumberland last Saturday where he consulted an oculist who gave it as his opinion that the sight was entirely destroyed.

Mr. Bert C. Feather, of Cranesville, who purchased the Charles Shaffer farm adjoining Oakland on the west, removed from his old home to his recently acquired possession last Thursday. Mr. Feather has been interested for some months in the Ravenscroft Lumber Company, and his removal to this vicinity adds one more good citizen to the number already residing in Oakland and the surroundiug community.

The present week has been one of decided changes in weather conditions. Monday there was rain, hail, sunshine, snow, high winds and this order reversed, mixed conglomerately and then spread out in thin and thick layers throughout the entire day and evening. Tuesday morning those who had become impressed with the idea that spring was about to open became aware of the fact when they arose from their slumbers that spring is elusive, for the ground was covered with a mantle of the beautiful. Tuesday night the snow continued to fall and yesterday morning more than three inches was in evidence.

TRACT OF TIMBER BROUGHT $7,550.

Two Hundred and Fifty-Six Acres Bought by Messrs. D. E. Offutt & Sons.

Mr. Daniel Annan, of Cumberland, trustee of the estate of the late Robert M. Perry, who died last fall at his home near Mountain Lake Park, disposed of a portion of the real estate of the decedent at public auction on last Friday afternoon to Messrs. D. E. Offutt & Sons, of Oakland, for the sum of $7,550.

The tract sold by Mr. Annan consists of Military Lots Nos. 890, 895, 892, 978, twenty-three acres of Lot No. 979 and twenty-eight acres of Lot No. 906, containing in all 256 acres, the major portion covered with a fine growth of white and red oak timber.

The sale was attended by a number of persons interested in the lumber industry in this section and the bidding was quite spirited.

The land is located about two miles south of Mountain Lake Park, and is accessible to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad which will be used to ship the lumber after its manufacture.

To Peter F. Nine upon the personal estate of Eva Moon.

Every student in our schools should be moral if for no other reason than for the excellency and worth of character and life it confers. No character is complete till it is swayed and elevated by genuine piety. No heart is fully happy till it is imbued with the spirit of piety. No life is all it may and should be till its motives are baptised in the waters of piety. No soul is saved till it is transformed by the gracious spirit of this daughter of the skies. This divine grace should be sought by every young man and woman and cultivated with the most assiduous care, for without it we are destitute of the highest beauty and divinest charm and power of manhood or womanhood.

Few people stop to think that their individual happiness is not dependent on outside circumstances. A habit of happiness can be cultivated, like any other habit and just as successfully. Happiness is as much a duty as cleanliness and morality. The cheerful, hopeful temper which refuses to let itself be harrowed up, it is everyone's duty to cultivate. There is a beautiful legend that at creation's dawn an angel came dawn to earth, seeking something to take back with it to heaven. It returned with a bouquet of flowers, a baby's smile and a mother's love. When it reached the pearly gates of Paradise again the flowers had withered, the baby's smile had vanished, but the mother's love was found to be as pure and eternal as the waters that flowed by the heavenly throne, and all the angels exclaimed: "There is nothing on earth pure enough for heaven but a mother's love."

Birds In The Bush

By JOHN I. GALLAGHER.

Copyright, 1906, by John I. Gallagher.

WHEN a regular army man who has seen service in the Philippines pulls out his watch, disengages it from its chamois skin cover and chuckles apropos to nothing in particular you can get the tail end of this story by joining in the laugh and casually inquiring, "Who was it that finally earned the everlasting blessing of Private Reilly by stringing up the sable hued head hunter?"

It was the day following the terrible typhoon which swept the China sea and devastated the greater portion of Luzon back in 1900. Buildings were blown down, roads obliterated and the miles of army telegraph wires twisted into a thousand fantastic shapes.

Colonel Boyne had arisen early, and his orderly had occasion to note that the typhoon had also ruffled his temper. Now, there wasn't a better natured man in the army than the same Colonel Boyne, and if he so far forgot himself as to swear at the orderly it was because of the irritation arising from the possession of an interesting piece of information and no means of transmitting it in the proper channel.

When it is understood that the colonel's information concerned the definite location of Aguinaldo, when it is stated that permission to pursue the insurgent leader must be clicked from a point 150 miles distant over wires which could not be replaced without a week's work—when all these loose ends are tied in a hard knot, some idea may be obtained of the problem which confronted the exasperated officer.

"Send for Reilly," the colonel commanded as a last resort. "If anybody can reach Vigan with a whole skin, Aloysius is the lad. By Suln! I wish I could make the ride myself. It goes against the grain to order a man out on dangerous duty like that."

"Never fear for me, sir," Reilly assured him later in the day. "I was born to good luck, and, not havin' seen any of it up to the present writin', I think it must be about due."

"May all the saints in the calendar attend you, Reilly," said the colonel. "Take anything you need, not forgetting the birds, and make the start as soon as possible."

It was almost two hours after sunup when Reilly was at last ready to report to the colonel for final instructions.

"What have we here?" exclaimed the "old man" as he took in the vision of Private Reilly astride a rangy bay.

"Everything but the dispatches," answered Reilly. "You see, I am takin' Dewey along with me to do double duty as mascot and interpreter. He can babble every dialect in the island."

During this conversation the diminutive Dewey sat bolt upright on his native pony, a wicker cage fastened to the saddlebow and three days' rations lashed in the rear.

With a few parting words the colonel handed Reilly two yellow dispatches and ordered him to ride forward with all speed.

At the picket line Reilly drew rein, carefully concealed the dispatches under his inside hatband and leaned down to Sergeant Miller for a parting word.

"If the white carriers should come back without a message," he said, "just send a word back to Illinois and tell the little girl that gave them to me that she is the only one who ever cared whether Reilly or the sod was on top."

As a matter of fact, these white pigeons had brought down upon Reilly's head the witticisms of half the regiment. The fact that no hand but his was ever permitted to fondle or feed them was in itself sufficient evidence that Reilly was not impervious to the tender sentiments of life.

Not until noon did the bearer of dispatches rein up his willing mount. Tethering the animal where it would at once be in reach of both grass and water, Reilly stretched himself at full length on the ground and shut out the glare of the sun from his wearied eyes.

"Great Scott!" he exclaimed, suddenly starting to his feet. "I sure forgot the nigger, to say nothin' of the birds and rations."

As he hesitated, undecided as to the best course to pursue, the dull patter of a pony's unshod hoofs reached his ears. A moment later the little brown man bounced into sight, his right hand beating a tattoo on the animal's lean ribs and his voice raised in shrill expostulations over the pony's unsatisfactory progress.

A short breathing spell and they were again in the saddles. Not till darkness set in did they reach the foothills, which marked the first forty miles of their journey.

Dewey hobbled the horses in a grassy ravine and turned his attention to the preparation of the evening meal. As the provender consisted entirely of hard tack and bacon, his reputation as an excellent cook was not put to the test. Despite the hard day's work Reilly's appetite was missing. While Dewey ravenously devoured the scorched bacon Reilly sat idly tossing crumbs to the white carrier pigeons.

Reilly finally lay down to sleep, leaving Dewey to stand guard. At 11 o'clock the bearer of dispatches, who had never closed his eyes for a moment, arose to his feet and enacted a pantomime which was supposed to represent a tired trooper shaking off sound slumber. Taking this as the sign of his relief, Dewey was soon sleeping hard enough and loud enough for two men. When Reilly twisted him to his feet at the first suggestion of dawn he was chattering in broken English about head hunters and poisoned arrows and such like barbarities.

"What about the head hunters, Dewey?" said Reilly when they were once more on the way after a hasty assault on the hard tack and bacon.

"Him much there," Dewey affirmed, pointing in a direction which would seem to indicate that they were traveling straight for the region of these picturesque savages.

"No more eat native," persisted Dewey, glad of an opportunity to exercise his American vocabulary. "Him now eat only white heads." And he cast a meaning glance at Reilly's roseate top piece.

The semblance of a trail wound in and out, but steadily upward over rock strewn ground and through dense undergrowth. Suddenly Dewey pointed a brown finger toward a giant tree that stood outlined against the sky. Nestling in two of its limbs was what appeared to be a mammoth bird's nest.

"Head hunter live much high," he explained. "No can get."

"Oh, it wouldn't be any trouble getting that!" said Reilly, and, snatching his revolver from the holster, he took a snapshot at the lofty dwelling. The report was followed by a faint cry, and a contorted body dropped to the ground like a stone.

Reilly paused aghast at the outcome of his rash act. "That," he said half aloud, "is the poorest shot I ever made in my life. If I get out of this mess with a head on my shoulders it will be because I have more luck than"—

At that instant a noose dropped noiselessly over his shoulders, and he was unhorsed by a sudden tightening of the rope.

The first thought which came to Reilly's mind when he was set upon his feet, after being securely bound, was one of wonder over where this myriad of little brown men had all sprung from. Chattering like so many monkeys, they pressed about him, gesticulating wildly and no doubt threatening the most horrible forms of vengeance. Gazing over their heads, he caught sight of Dewey, also a captive, and their horses being driven off in the distance. The little wicker cage had evidently been broken open, and the frightened pigeons fluttered about high in the air.

As the natives dragged their captives toward a distant clearing the birds followed in circling flight. This fact evidently afforded the savages much pleasure, for they broke into a sort of droning chant, accompanying it with skyward gestures.

The advance guard finally came to a halt before a collection of grass huts which marked the center of the clearing. The prisoners were tightly bound to a highly decorated post which had evidently served in the same capacity on former occasions. As soon as they had satisfied themselves that there was no possibility of the victims escaping the whole company turned their attention once more to the two carriers which were now skimming back and forth scarcely twenty feet above the ground. At a sign from the chief they all prostrated themselves as if in worship.

"What in thunder are they up to now?" growled Reilly. "Why don't they chop heads and get it over with?"

Dewey was trembling with excitement. "Him gods," he explained. "Head hunter much 'fraid of white bird. Him spirit."

At the direction of the chief huge wooden bowls heaped with rice were brought out and displayed invitingly, but the birds did not respond to this enticement. The natives drew back and were about to again prostrate themselves when, to their amazement, the birds darted down swiftly and alighted with perfect confidence on the broad shoulders of the white prisoner.

Seizing upon this auspicious omen, Dewey broke forth into a ranting discourse addressed to the superstitious head hunters in their own dialect.

"Beware, devil begotten head hunters!" he howled. "You have dared to waylay a mighty god. See how the spirits come to him when you could not tempt them with much rice. Release him before an earthquake swallows you up or a typhoon blows you into the sea. Act quickly. The time is short."

Whether or not the presence of the pigeons, together with Dewey's harangue, would have alone been sufficient to effect a release will never be known. Scarcely had he ceased speaking when a black cloud blew across the hills and the distant rumble of thunder spurred the head hunters to action.

"If this is a god," said the chief, not entirely convinced, "he can kill, and he can make alive. With the boom-boom he has smitten my son. Let the white god restore him to life, and it is well."

"What's all the powpow about, Dewey?" asked Reilly anxiously. "I am not afraid to die, but I like to know when it is coming."

"You no die, you no die," chattered Dewey. "Me fix. Me tell him you much god. You quick loose. Ride like blazes. Dewey come soon."

Then, turning to the chief, Dewey resumed his palaver. "The white god can kill," he announced, "but not make alive. Let him depart. I, too, am a great spirit. I will say a word in your son's ear, and he shall be restored."

With his own hands the aged chief unbound Reilly and motioned him to where his horse was nervously pawing the ground. A second invitation was unnecessary. Shouldering his way through the crowd of excited natives, he vaulted into the saddle and turned his horse's head from the clearing. Once he glanced back and beheld Dewey wildly motioning him onward. It was destined to be the last time he should see his faithful little mascot.

"DEWEY!" HE SHOUTED JOYFULLY.

Not until dusk settled down that night did Reilly draw rein and slide from the back of his winded mount. He had little hope of Dewey overtaking him, but, banking on the mascot's proverbial luck, hoped to pick him up somewhere on the return trip. Dewey had been in many tight places before, but had always succeeded in wriggling out of them.

Reilly had just set about his preparations for the night when his ear caught the sound of snapping twigs and soft footfalls. As he turned the light of his campfire fell upon a brown face peering at him through the undergrowth.

"Dewey!" he shouted joyfully, but at that moment a native runner stepped out from the leafy screen, and he discovered his mistake.

The messenger had evidently traveled long and hard and was weak from exhaustion. Sinking down on his knees, he bowed low before Reilly.

"Much god—make alive!" he wailed. "Black man no can—chief's son no live—kill black devil—white god come make both alive."

The truth of the situation flashed into Reilly's mind. The faithful Dewey had thrown himself into the breach and had fallen a victim to the barbarous natives. By sending the runner with the news of Dewey's death the old chief hoped to recall Reilly and secure the life of his son.

In such fragments of dialect as he could command Reilly made the messenger understand his displeasure. He refused absolutely to return.

Prepared for this possible exigency, the messenger pleaded on behalf of the chief for some token from the white god which would offer protection from the earthquake and the typhoon.

With surprising alacrity Reilly produced the chamois skin cover of his watch and an indelible pencil. With the latter he made a few mysterious signs upon the former and handed it to the trembling messenger.

"Take it, you scum of the earth," he said, "and God grant that the prescription may be filled mighty sudden."

A month later a small band of head hunters fell into the hands of a detachment of American scouts. One of the natives bore himself with great dignity and on the supposition that he was a chief of some prominence was finally brought before Colonel Boyne. During the course of examination the chief, in order to substantiate his claim of immunity, produced a very soiled piece of chamois skin upon which certain words were still discernible. This is what Colonel Boyne made out of it:

"The bearer murdered Dewey. Hang him on sight and receive the blessing of Private Aloysius J. Reilly."

THE GRANGE

Conducted by
J. W. DARROW, Chatham, N. Y.,
Press Correspondent New York State Grange

VICTORIES FOR THE GRANGE.

Consistent Opposition to the Ship Subsidy Bill.

The Globe of Boston recently published an interview with National Master Bachelder in which he said that the national grange, Patrons of Husbandry, had won two notable victories in congress at the session just adjourned.

"The amendment to the denatured alcohol law enacted at the first session of the Fifty-ninth congress, which was adopted in the closing hours of the second session, just closed, enables farmers to engage in the production of denatured alcohol, which under the provisions of the law as first enacted could only be done by large distillers, by allowing the denaturing to be done in locked tanks in distilleries which may be established upon any farm.

"It also provides for the transportation of the product by pipe lines and in tank cars, which will materially reduce the cost to the consumers. This legislation was opposed by the distillers' trust and by those representing monopolies whose product will be displaced by denatured alcohol as a source of heat, light and power at reduced cost to consumers. The influence of the national grange, composed of about a million members in thirty states, was a powerful factor in securing the passage of the original bill and this amendment.

"For more than ten years this great farmers' organization in its national and state conventions has unanimously opposed the ship subsidy proposition in every form. The emasculated ship subsidy bill, which was forced through the house by questionable means this winter, but defeated in the closing hours of the senate, was fought by every available means by the grange, and it is a matter of satisfaction to the members of this organization in all sections of the country that the bill was defeated.

"The opposition of the grange was based upon what it believes to be sound economic principles without a tinge of partisanship in its action, and the opposition to the measure by the representatives from the great agricultural states of the central west, irrespective of political affiliation, is evidence of its loyalty to the interests of agriculture in opposing it. I regard the result upon these two measures the greatest victory the grange has ever won in national legislation in the interests of the farmers of the country."

GRANGE LIFE INSURANCE.

Report of Special Committee on Subject to New York State Grange.

Your committee appointed to investigate and, if considered feasible, to suggest a plan of life insurance to the state grange at the regular annual meeting in February would respectfully reports that after careful consideration of the matter it has decided it advisable not to submit any plan of life insurance to the state grange at the present time and would recommend that no action be taken by the life insurance association at this meeting for these reasons:

First.—There appears to be no demand for such an association by the Patrons of the state; second, fraternal and co-operative life insurance appears to be still in an experimental state. Statistics tell us there are about 100 fraternal companies in associations doing business at the present time in the United States, that their total risks are about $7,000,000,000 distributed in 500,000 policies in round numbers. The oldest of these associations has been in existence not much over thirty years, while the great majority are of very recent date. In addition to these, there are the records of seventy or eighty others that were organized with enthusiasm, flourishing for a time and finally going the way of all the living, leaving thousands of their members poorer, but wiser.

There are undoubtedly many co-operative associations as safe and reliable as the old line companies, but their rates are necessarily nearly or quite as high as those of the great life insurance companies. Life insurance is a much more complicated and difficult problem to deal with than fire insurance, and it does not appear to your committee that it would be wise for any one state grange to enter into competition with all the other companies now in the field in the business of life insurance. This brings us to a third and very important reason. The national grange at its last meeting in November at Denver, Colo., took up the matter of life insurance and discussed it thoroughly with the assistance of men who were experts in the business. The matter is now in the hands of a committee of the national grange. If a safe and reliable plan of fraternal or co-operative life insurance can be devised and put in operation by the national grange, the initiative would seem to be in the right place, and it would be unwise for one or more state granges to adopt plans which might conflict with it or with each other.

Another grange national bank was organized recently in Pennsylvania. Why do we not hear more of grange banks in other states? If they operate successfully in one state, why not in another?

New grange halls are arising in several states. Good sign!

We Should Watch Our Political Parties.

By GROVER CLEVELAND, Ex-President of the United States.

IF we find that the wickedness of destructive agitators and the SELFISH DEPRAVITY OF DEMAGOGUES have stirred up discontent and strife where there should be peace and harmony and have arrayed against each other interests which should dwell together in hearty co-operation; if we find that the old standards of sturdy, uncompromising American honesty have become so corroded and weakened by a SORDID ATMOSPHERE that our people are hardly startled by crimes in high places and shameful betrayals of trust everywhere; if we find a sadly prevalent disposition among us to turn from the highway of honorable industry into shorter crossroads leading to irresponsible and worthless ease; if we find that widespread wastefulness and extravagance have discredited the WHOLESOME FRUGALITY which was once the pride of Americanism, we should recall the admonition that harmony, industry and frugality are ESSENTIAL PILLARS OF PUBLIC FELICITY and forthwith endeavor to change our course.

The sooner we reach a state of mind which keeps constantly before us as a living, active, impelling force the truth that our people, good or bad, harmonious or with daggers drawn, honest or unscrupulous, industrious or idle, constitute THE SOURCE OF OUR NATION'S TEMPERAMENT AND HEALTH and that the traits and faults of our people must necessarily give quality and color to our national behavior, the sooner we shall appreciate the importance of protecting this source from unwholesome contamination. And the sooner all of us honestly acknowledge this to be an INDIVIDUAL duty that cannot be shifted or evaded and the more thoroughly we purge ourselves from influences that hinder its conscientious performance, the sooner will our country be regenerated and made secure by the saving power of GOOD CITIZENSHIP.

It is our habit to affiliate with political parties. Happily the strength and solidity of our institutions can safely withstand the utmost freedom and activity of political discussion so far as it involves the adoption of GOVERNMENTAL POLICIES or the enforcement of good administration. But they cannot withstand the frenzy of hate which seeks under the guise of political earnestness to blot out American brotherhood and to cunningly persuade our people that A CRUSADE OF ENVY AND MALICE is no more than a zealous insistence upon their manhood rights.

Political parties are exceedingly human, and they easier fall before temptation than individuals by so much as partisan success is the law of their life and because THEIR RESPONSIBILITY IS IMPERSONAL. It is easily recalled that political organizations have been quite willing to utilize gusts of popular prejudice and resentment, and I believe they have been known as a matter of shrewd management to encourage voters to hope for some measure of relief from economic abuses and yet to stand pat on the day appointed FOR REALIZATION.

WE HAVE FALLEN UPON A TIME WHEN IT BEHOOVES EVERY THOUGHTFUL CITIZEN WHOSE POLITICAL BELIEFS ARE BASED ON REASON AND WHO CARES ENOUGH FOR HIS MANLINESS AND DUTY TO SAVE THEM FROM BARTER TO REALIZE THAT THE ORGANIZATION OF THE PARTY OF HIS CHOICE NEEDS WATCHING AND THAT AT TIMES IT IS NOT AMISS CRITICALLY TO OBSERVE ITS DIRECTION AND TENDENCY.

The Danger of Large Gifts.

By HANNIS TAYLOR, Former Minister to Spain.

I KNOW of no MONSTER so dangerous to the life of a republic as one who can in a moment throw bewildering millions in one direction or the other, especially when those millions grow out of ABNORMAL LEGAL AND ECONOMIC CONDITIONS that should not exist.

The omnipotent dispenser may throw his millions in a good direction today. It is sure to be A BAD ONE tomorrow. But most and worst of all, he is an image breaker, he is an iconoclast who SHATTERS THE IDEALS upon which the life of this nation was founded. There was a time when men admired poets, orators, theologians, philosophers, novelists, historians. There was a time when our young men thought it worth while to strive to be like Marshall, Webster, Emerson and Washington Irving.

But how long will those illusions last under the teachings of the new gospel, which proclaims that nothing is really worth while except the BRUTE FORCE wielded by masses of money?

IF THIS THING GOES ON, WE CAN SOON CLOSE ALL DEPARTMENTS OF OUR UNIVERSITIES EXCEPT THOSE THAT APPLY THE PRINCIPLES OF PHYSICAL SCIENCE TO THE PRODUCTION OF MATERIAL WEALTH OR ITS EQUIVALENT.

How to Curb the Monopolies.

By President J. G. SCHURMAN of Cornell University.

I SUPPOSE there is little doubt that in SOME FEW industries monopoly actually exists and oppression is actually practiced by making the public pay extortionate prices.

There are remedies in reach which may be used AT ANY TIME. In the first place, trusts which are monopolistic and oppressive may be DEPRIVED OF THE ADVANTAGES which they now enjoy as a result of tariff or other legislation. If any tariff does actually enable a trust to exploit the people for its own enrichment, that tariff schedule IS DOOMED, no matter how much talk there may be of the sanctity of the tariff or the solemn duty of standing pat.

A SECOND REMEDY IS A BETTER REGULATION OF CORPORATIONS AND TRUSTS IN THE INTEREST OF THE PUBLIC.

Perhaps we may see the big corporations legally enjoined from charging markedly DIFFERENT PRICES for the same commodity in different parts of the country for the sole purpose of freezing out independent rivals.

VALUE OF TIME

Minutes and Hours Well Spent Have Brought Fortune to Many.

People save money. Some save millions, some thousands, some hundreds, and some quarters and dimes. The penny itself is not disdained, and the metal savings bank comes into play for those who cannot hold money unless some one else holds the key.

But time, who thinks of saving it? Where is the metal bank to hold the hours, the minutes?

We meet people every day who say: "I'd like to do that, but I haven't time. I haven't a minute to call my own." The more leisure a man has, as a rule, the less time he has in which to do things. The man of action rarely complains of lack of time. Why? Because he husbands the moments and catches them before they are on the wing.

It is a momentous question, the question of how we spend the quarter of the hour. This use or disuse of the half hour, the quarter hour, or the five minutes, means either success or failure.

There is a firm in Chicago today that is staving ahead simply by its use of time. The firm is a small one, a bindery, but new machinery constantly is added and new men, as the increase of business requires. The firm consists of four brothers, and they do their own soliciting, make their own estimates on work, and are their own advertising agents. These men work from twelve to fourteen hours a day every day, and on holidays spends half the day at the office. Time to them is money.

The office man who voluntarily gets to his office a quarter of an hour earlier and stays a quarter of an hour later, to keep up his work when it thickens, is the man who wins. 'Twas the Duke of Wellington who said that he owed all he had achieved to his being ready a quarter of an hour before it seemed necessary, and that this was a lesson learned in boyhood.

Many a man out of work has found out to his sorrow that in applying for a desirable position early Monday morning another more fortunate has secured the job by beating him perhaps only by the margin of a minute.

The train waits for no man. Time passes on. Fortunes are won and men's names are written in marble while the dreamer has let time, like water, pass through life's sieve and leave nothing behind.

The doctor who wins is the man who has time to study, time to keep abreast of the times, time for original research, as well as time in which to cure his patients. One doctor translated Lucretius while going his daily rounds among his patients.

Take the most prominent clergymen of any city. They are engaged in the most useful works. They give their time up to worthy causes, but they do not fritter it away. Cotton Mather shows what a strenuous clergyman in the days of simple living could do. He wrote and published fourteen books in one year. This by saving every moment. It was a crime not to be diligent in those days.

Geniuses never keep the eight-hour day rule. They are not unionists.

Elihu Burritt, the blacksmith, mastered twenty-two dialects and eighteen languages, and did not plead lack of time or advantages.

George Stevenson, while a brakeman, took time to learn every detail of the engine. And at night he worked over and over in his mind the mechanical problems that perplexed him and often spent more time in bed thinking than sleeping. Thus do great men attain their heights.

Charles Darwin pondered twenty years on the origin of species before he gave it to the world, producing a work which was the labor of time as well as of thought.

William Gladstone's life was a living example of what a man can do with time well spent. His words are still a bugle call:

"Believe me, when I tell you that thrift of time will repay you in after life with a usury of profit beyond your most sanguine dreams and that the waste of it will make you dwindle, alike in intellectual and moral stature, beyond your darkest reckonings."

THE VICE PRESIDENCY

No Longer Regarded as a Refuge on The Road to Oblivion.

Under the theory of a dozen or two dozen years ago the Vice Presidency was, for the ambitious statesman, the last refuge on the road to oblivion. The incumbent of that office shows that this conception is essentially wrong. Charles W. Fairbanks, as Vice President, has been so successful and has made himself so popular that he has not only strengthened himself, but has aided his party.

When held by the right sort of a man like Mr. Fairbanks, the Vice Presidency is a great office. In the even divisions in the Senate consisting of the members of only thirteen States, Vice President John Adams gave the casting vote which put twenty-two measures, most of them of very great importance, on the statute book. Calhoun, while Vice President, gave Senator Hayne, of his State, the points by which he figured in that memorable debate with Webster, which was the prelude to nullification. Van Buren's tact and urbanity in the second office aided powerfully in winning for him the first office. Breckinridge, who held the second place on the Buchanan ticket, made such a popular official that the Southern end of his party put him at the head of its ticket in the Douglas split of 1860. If Hamlin had been renominated for Vice President in 1864, as many Republicans at that time belived he ought to have been, and as the whole country a year later wished he had been, the fight between President and Congress in 1865-68, when Lincoln's death sent Andrew Johnson to the Presidency, would have been averted, and the country would have been spared a humiliating scandal.

By his service of eight years in that body as a Senator, Mr. Fairbanks became acquainted with nearly all its members, and got a very valuable knowledge of its atmosphere and its traditions. Thus he was particularly well equipped for the position of its presiding officer, which he gained in the election of 1904. He is as skillful a parliamentarian as was Colfax, who went to the second office in Grant's first term, and he and he has won a popularity among his associates and among the leaders of his party in and out of Congress equaling that which Hobart acquired in the first term of McKinley. Mr. Fairbanks' experience in the past two years shows the great possibilities for an able, tactful, and ambitious statesman which the Viee Presidency offers. It is not remarkable that at two recent notable public demonstrations, one in Baltimore and the other in Chicago, Mr Fairbanks was acclaimed as the next President.

Sharpless Public School No. 11 of 1st Election District.

This venture is but an infant, struggling to stand alone among the established edifices of learning in Garrett. It fills a need the surrounding population was considered too sparse to afford, and less than a year back when a move for the building was made doubting Thomases were quick to place their stamp of failure upon the project. But bright children distant from other schools were growing up in unlettered darkness and their fathers and friends took these facts before the County School Board. That body extended a ready hand and the neat little building went up just in time for the opening of the school term in the autum of 1906.

The trustees had achieved a victory and to maintain and extend its benefits, they secured Miss Mary E. Miller, a graduate of St. Mary's Seminary, as their teacher, and her administration has been thorough and successful in every department.

The largest number of children possible in the school was fifteen, the average attendance was fourteen and the last two weeks each one of the entire fifteen was daily and punctually in place. Going to school at once became an honorable pleasure with the pupils, and failure meant an ignominy that distressed them. All this was all accomplished by loving interest and persuasive means of their devoted young teacher.

The closing program of the school crowded the tastefully decorated room with an orderly and highly pleased audience, including all three of the trustees. The hand of skill and sound management was clearly expressed in the many exercises through which the bright little boys and girls passed with such admirable credit to themselves, without a single hitch or embarrassing pause.

We had hoped to write of the spirited rendition of the National anthem, the drill, marching and counter-marching, readings and recitals, and would do so now but for a dread of the Editor's hand, with the waste basket waiting for articles too long for the printers' endurance.

All conversant with the facts agree that the end of this first year's history of the Sharpless school leaves this infant venture upright in its cradle and crowned with success.

THE GRANGE

Conducted by
J. W. DARROW, Chatham, N. Y.,
Press Correspondent New York State Grange

A BUSINESS GRANGE.

Transactions Amounting to $30,000 a Year Handled With Satisfaction.

[Special Correspondence.]

The business part of Monroe (N. Y.) grange amounts to about $30,000 per year. We do business only with the members of the grange. The commercial secretary will take no orders from nonmembers. We meet each Wednesday evening. When the work of the grange reaches the order of standing committees, the commercial secretary reads all quotations and information received by him during the week for the general information of the members. Thus the Patrons keep thoroughly posted on prices, and, what is perhaps more important, the commercial secretary holds the confidence of the members.

After the reading of the correspondence orders are in order and are taken and booked. This is done by the Patrons remaining in their seats and stating aloud their wants. Goods are ordered as soon as the required quantity is booked. Our wants consist mainly of feed stuffs, which we purchase in all markets where price and quality suit best. We also buy wire, hardware, groceries, boots and shoes; in fact, we look up anything the Patrons want if for nothing more than to keep posted on prices. As soon as the commercial secretary gets an invoice for a car of feed he makes out bills to the Patrons interested in the car and presents them at the next regular meeting of the grange. Under the order of bills and accounts the Patron's name is called, and he steps up and pays his bill. When all have paid, the money is passed to the treasurer, who receipts for the same and deposits it in the bank, where it is ready to meet draft when car arrives. No sight drafts are honored. When the car arrives, the treasurer pays the draft and notifies parties having purchases (from a list furnished him by the commercial secretary) that the car will be unloaded the following day. We have a member who delivers the goods to the Patrons as they drive up to the car and keeps a memorandum of the same, which he returns to the commercial secretary. No goods are ever left over. Each transaction closes itself when goods are delivered. Each car is numbered, and all bills belonging to it carry the same number.

The expense of running the business end of the grange is about 25 cents per ton or 1¼ to 1½ per cent on the business done. We need no storeroom nor extra handling, but use the cars as our shop. We pay one-half of 1 per cent on all purchases to the commercial secretary, 10 cents per ton on all sacked goods to the unloader and 2½ cents per ton to the treasurer, which is added to the Patron's bills. Our Patrons get everything at the lowest possible price, and yet those who do the work receive pay for their time.

JOHN KROUSE.

ALMOST 7,000 MEMBERS.

Jefferson County, N. Y., Makes a Good Report to the State Grange.

We have thirty-three granges, twenty-four of which own their halls, and all are in a prosperous condition. The membership Sept. 30, 1906, was 6,740, a gain of 271 during the year, and Jan. 1 the membership was 6,798. The Pomona has a membership of 610. We still continue the practice of appointing fifth degree members to visit every grange and report at the September meeting, thus making another link between the Pomona and subordinate grange.

A lecturers' association was organized in 1905, which held three meetings the past year and seems to be of considerable interest and benefit, and much more is hoped for in the future. The Patrons' Fire Relief association is now carrying about $13,000,000 in risks, and, although heavy losses were incurred last year, an assessment of $2 per thousand was ample to pay all claims. Nearly $28,000 was saved last year by this means over the old companies.

H. S. TODD.

For Better Telephone Service.

So extensive has become the operation of the rural telephone that a better exchange service is desired in order to make it more efficient. A resolution was adopted by the New York state grange asking for a state law compelling all telephone companies to receive and transmit over their lines messages originating with competing companies. This law is demanded in the interest of farmers who have rural telephones and who cannot secure connection with competing lines. A similar law was asked for by the state grange of Maine four years ago, and it was enacted by the legislature of that state and is in force today. The law has been tested as to its constitutionality, and the court of appeals has decided it constitutional.

Grange Speakers In New York.

It cost the New York state grange $2,651.41 last year to pay the per diem and expenses of speakers assigned by the state master to visit various subordinate and county granges during the year. This year a fund of $2,500 has been set apart as a speakers' fund, which will enable each county to have at least two meetings at which state speakers will be present irrespective of grange membership, and, in addition, there will be held other meetings proportionate to the total grange membership in the county.

SEMI-MUNICIPAL OWNERSHIP.

Partnerships Between Cities and Companies Are Bad.

Whenever in these days an electric light company is unfortunate enough to have a street lighting contract expire in a city where the municipal ownership of the street lighting plant has been agitated there sometimes comes forth out of the chaos of ideas as to how the municipal ownership business should be handled some proposition from a private company which purports to have the welfare of the city rather than any private gain at heart.

This company, with great love for the commonwealth, either real or assumed, usually comes forward with a proposition for a kind of "semi-municipal ownership," the company to perform the work of lighting the city for a number of years at a good round sum and at the end of the contract the lighting plant to be turned over to the city free of cost and payment for the plant to be made out of the regular monthly payments of the city for its lighting, such monthly payments being invariably a good round sum per lamp. Now, such propositions as this may be made in good faith by a company of public spirited but misguided citizens who really wish to serve the city, and there are usually some respectable names connected with an enterprise of this kind when it is launched. However, there is usually an African somewhere in the woodpile or at least a strong possibility that there will be one before the game is through.

It seems remarkable that any municipality in this day and generation can be deluded into the belief that any such scheme of semi-municipal ownership can compare for a minute with a good, straight, short contract at reasonable rates with a corporation already in the lighting field. After all, a redeeming feature to this scheme is that at the end of a term of years it is fairly certain to bring home forcibly to a municipality the depreciation due to advance in the art as well as the depreciation caused by wear and tear.—Electrical World.

ITS INFLUENCE ON BRIBERY.

Municipal Ownership Would Modify, but Not Abolish It.

One of the truest statements made by advocates of municipal ownership is that it would put an end to bribery of city officials by public service corporations. It certainly would wherever that is practiced. But it wouldn't put an end to bribeable officials, and unless the city should manufacture its own engines, machinery, street cars, electric lamps and other supplies the quality and price of these would be largely regulated by such officials.

Every one who is familiar with the school trade knows that orders for school books and supplies are in many cities obtainable only by crossing the palms of members of school boards with a liberal supply of gold and that a change of textbooks is frequently ordered merely because of these itching palms.

Municipal ownership will not change human nature, and venal officials can hold up manufacturing companies just as easily and profitably as they can lighting and traction companies. Did it ever occur to you that a corporation isn't anxious to get rid of its money that way? But when it comes to a holdup almost any one will give up the "long green" to "public servants" who are zealous, not for the public welfare, but for their private purse.

No Intimation of Graft.

A dispatch from Wilkesbarre in regard to the municipal electric light plant of Easton, Pa., the breakdown of which has left that city in temporary darkness, says:

"There is no intimation of graft. The condition is due apparently to the fact that city employees, appointed by men holding political office, cannot be expected to have the same knowledge of the electric lighting business that skilled employees of private corporations have, and consequently there is waste and inefficiency in a city plant which would not be possible in a well conducted private plant."

Why He Opposes "M. O."

As a member of our city council some years ago I investigated this question of municipal ownership before we contracted for our electric lights and found that in every instance where the cost of municipal lighting was reported below that offered by independent contractors the difference and more appeared on the general taxes, and in most places it was frankly admitted that the light and water plants were built by the city, but used by the politicians.—Homer E. Stewart in Warren (O.) Chronicle.

A Glimpse of the Millennium.

Government ownership of railroads and telegraphs and municipal ownership of public utilities may come sometime, but will never come without damage to the public welfare until every phase of the management and operation of the same is put on a strictly nonpartisan merit system and thorough business principles.—Mansfield (O.) News.

A Pertinent Question.

It seems to us well to ask ourselves not whether we propose to run railroads, telegraphs, street cars, water and gas works, electric light plants and all the rest of it, but whether we intend to keep the same sort of government that we have had for more than a hundred years.—Editorial in Indianapolis News.

Municipal ownership is an experiment not lightly to be ventured upon at the alarm call of politicians who want to be elected to office.—New York Sun.

BIDS WILL NOT BE RECEIVED UNTIL MAY 4.

Contractors Who Desire to Bid for Construction of Court House Ask Delay.

Senator W. McCulloh Brown, secretary of the Court House Commission, has written this office stating that the contract for the erection of the proposed new court house in Oakland will not be given out until May 4th, 1907, at ten o'clock a. m., when all persons desiring to submit prices for the work are expected to be present and file their bids.

The delay in awarding the contract is in response to requests of the contractors who wish to bid on the work and under the advice of the architect, Mr. J. Riley Gordon, of New York. The chairman of the Commission, Hon. Robert R. Henderson, has authorized the extention of time to the contractors.

In another column will be found the advertisement extending the time until May 4th.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The condition of Helen Laughlin, whose serious illness was noted in a former issue, is alarming her friends. Tuesday evening her grand father, Dr. J. W. Laughlin, and daughter Sada, of this place, were called to her bedside in Grafton, W. Va. Later—At 7 a. m. today (Thursday) Mrs. Dr. Laughlin was dispatched for informing her that the relatives were expecting her death at any moment. Mrs. Laughlin left on the 9.15 a. m. train for Grafton.

Work has been resumed on the new postoffice building at the station. Mr. Wilson, of the Park, has charge.

The snow is fast disappearing and we hope for more pleasant weather.

Mrs. Stephen Mattingly, of Piedmont, was visiting relatives here Saturday.

Mr. Wiley Welling, who has been working in Piedmont most of the past winter, has been here several days.

Mr. H. B. Ferguson and family returned to the Park this week. They are occupying the same house they lived in before moving to Oakland. Their host of friends in this neighborhood are pleased at their return.

Mr. Thomas Harris, whose illness has been noted, will probably go to Baltimore for treatment in the near future.

Mr. and Mrs. John Johns, who have spent the winter visiting their children, returned to their summer home here Monday, coming from the home of their son Samuel, in Brooklyn, N. Y., where they spent most of the winter.

The brick sidewalk at the station was damaged and the mail crane destroyed wednesday by the rear car on a freight train becoming derailed.

NORMAL SCHOOLS OPENED

Three in the County and All Have Large Enrollments.

The three Normal schools of Garrett county—at Bittinger, Friendsville and Oakland—are now opened and reports from these points indicate that in every case the several schools will be successful in point of attendance at least.

The school at Friendsville, taught by Profs. Beahm and Browning, opened with an enrollment of of twenty-eight. Several students have been added since and yesterday the enrollment numbered thirty-three.

The Bittinger school, under the direction of Prof. King, of Grantsville, did not open until Tuesday owing to Prof. King's inability to get to Bittinger before Monday evening. The enrollment at that point is now twenty with several students yet to report who have determined to attend there.

The Oakland school, under the joint direction of Messrs. Morris K. Turner and F. E. Rathbun, enrolled forty-six scholars the first day. This number has been steadily inceasing every day since until yesterday at noon the enrollment reached sixty-six. Indications point to a considerable augmentation of this number, which will probably reach eighty before the week is out.

Tuesday the Oakland school was visited unexpectedly by State Superintendent Stevens who warmly congratulated students and instructors upon the attendance and the interest shown in educational matters in the county as a whole.

We congratulate the teachers of the county in responding so readily to the opportunity given them to attend these normals and also upon the fact that they have in every case men of such wide experience and ability as instructors. This year promises to be one of the best in the line of education Garrett has ever experienced.

A Surprise Party.

Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Mealy, of University Driveway gave a surprise party at their home on Saturday evening in honor of their son, Earl, who attained the dignified age of 17 on that day. About 20 of his young friends were present. The amusements consisted of games of various kinds, and music. A delicious lunch was served by Mrs. Mealy, assisted by her accomplished daughter, Miss Effie. The affair was thoroughly enjoyed throughout.—Morgantowu Dominion.

Leg Broken.

Hugh Bateman, employed on the log train of DuBois & Bond Bros., saw mill operators in District No. 4, had his left leg broken Tuesday by being caught between a log which he was assisting to load and the rail on a log truck. Both bones of his leg were broken between the knee and ankle. Dr. H. M. Kemp, of Bloomington, reduced the fracture.

OBJECTIONS TO THE COURT HOUSE PLANS.

Contractors Declare That the Drawings Are Vague and Unintelligible.

The old saying, now threadbare with age, that "one has to go from home to learn the news," has been brought forcibly to the minds of many Garrett countians within the past few days, owing to the objections and faults found by contractors in the plans and specifications for the new court house to be erected in Oakland.

In the Tuesday afternoon edition of the Fairmont West Virginian an article, which we give below, was published concerning the get-up of the plans and specifications for the building, which, if true, will not only be a great drawback in constructing the building but will probably delay its construction for another year, unless the matter is taken in hand by the Court House Commission and new and understandable plans and specifications be drawn and placed at the disposal of contractors within a very short time.

The many contractors who have been in Oakland from several points all find defects of a more or less serious nature in the drawings and directions for the erection of the structure, the most serious being that the scale is laid down to one-eighth of an inch to the foot, no openings in the building sized, nor the tensile strength or size of eye-beams or the many girders which must necessarily bear the great weight of the building specified.

The article above referred to from our Fairmont contemparary is as follows:

"The building committee that has charge of the erection of the courthouse at Oakland seems to have learned something since the truth has come out about the cost of the Pennsylvania capitol building. At least the plans for the new court-house as drawn by the architect are so vague that contractors are not able to make bids for the erection of the structure. There is only one copy of the plans and that has to remain in the office where it is filed.

"In the drawing up of plans it is customary for the architect to make the drawings on a quarter of an inch scale. These drawings are made on an eighth of an inch scale. Nothing specified as to what materials are to be used.

"Holbert & Spedden, a local firm, intended to place a bid with the building committee. Mr. Spedden was at Oakland all day Saturday and stayed there until midnight, but could not connect with anything that would enable him to place an intelligent bid.

"S. D. Brady, representing the Brady Construction Company, was in Oakland Saturday. He came home without being able to obtain enough data to enable him to bid.

"The Elliott Wentzell Company, of Clarksburg, was represented by Mr. Elliott. Mr. Elliott was in Garrett's capital three days, but did not fare a bit better than did Mr. Spedden or Mr. Brady."

Rabies Epidemic in Grant County.

A short time ago a mad dog created considerable excitement in one section of Grant county, W. Va. Some people at the time thought and hoped it was not a genuine case of rabies, but later developements proved different.

A dog belonging to Jacob Reel, of Seymoursville, went mad and was shot.

The dog was bitten by the mad dog mentioned before. Since that time Mr. Reel had kept the animal confined; when he went to feed it, it was acting queerly and would not eat and next morning it was frothing at the mouth and wild eyed, and was biting viciously at everything in sight.

A fine fat hog belonging to Jeff Grove developed symptoms of rabies in all its horrible form, and the animal was killed.

These two cases were only a few hours apart and are suggestive of a condition at once so serious as to be intensely alarming. Further developments are awaiting with fear and trembling by the people of that section.

Found Oil.

The noted oil man, J. Wesley Beatty from Rodamers, was here on Monday en route to Kingwood, with samples of an oil which he said was recently taken from his water well at home. He left a bottle of this oil with us and any one who will call at the Den may inspect this latest sample of the freaks of nature. It is almost as transparent as engine oil but has a decided smell of kerosene. It would no doubt be very valuable if it could be secured in large quantities.—Tunnelton Cor. Kingwood Journal.

COUNTY TAX RATE IS FIXED AT 93 CENTS

While Being One Cent More Than Last Year Total Rate Is 6 1-2 Cent. Less.

Last night at a late hour the Board of County Commissioners completed the onerous work of providing for the many items of expense incident to the government of the county, when they signed the levy fixing the rate of taxation for county purposes at 93 cents on the $100.

While this amount is one cent in excess of last year's rate, the needs of the county have been greater and the Commissioners we are sure will receive the hearty congratulations of the people whom they are serving in keeping the rate so low. While the county rate is higher there is an appreciable decrease in the rate for State purposes, last year the rate being 23½ cents and this year it is but 16 cents, a net decrease for State and county purposes of 6½ cents. The total rate for the present year is $1.09 as against $1.15½ last year.

In making the appropriations the Commissioners provided for $3,000 to cover interest on the court house bond coupons; $19,000 for schools; $7,000 for bridges; $14,000 for roads and $4,300 for election expenses. The first item, that of interest, is an extraordinary expense.

The levy in its entirety will be published in this paper next Thursday.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. THOMAS K. HARVEY.

Died, at her home near Kearney, on Thursday, April 11, 1907, after an ill of several weeks, Susan Wilson, wife of ex-County Commissioner Thomas K. Harvey, aged nearly sixty-nine years. The deceased was the mother of six children, who with her husband survive her. She was the sister of Daniel, James H., William J., and the late George W. Wilson, all prominent men of Garrett county, and was held in high esteem by hundreds of friends and neighbors who sincerely regret her demise. Mrs. Harvey's funeral occurred on Saturday from the White church, the services being conducted by Rev. E. P. Idleman, pastor. She was a consistent member of the M. E. church.

ROBERT MASDEN PORTER.

Died, at Springfield Hospital, Baltimore county, this state, on Sunday afternoon last, after an illness of two hours of heart failure, Robert Masden Porter, aged eighty years, four months and two days. Mr. Porter for many years was one of the leading citizens of this section of Garrett county, being engaged as a farmer from the early sixties until late in life when his health gave way and he was compelled to retire from active duties. He was born in Cecil county, Md., and came to this part of the state when the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad was building, being employed by that corporation. In 1852 he was married to Miss Caroline V. Loar, daughter of George Loar, who died many years ago, and sister of the late David H. Loar, who is remembered by many of the younger generation as one of Oakland's good citizens. Mr. Porter's marriage took place at the home of his bride and a number of years later he purchased the farm, which has since been subdivided, being now owned by his son George, Mr. George Shartzer and others. Mr. Porter is remembered as an upright, honest citizen, and though unaffiliated with a church organization he was a true Christian. His wife died more than thirty years ago and is buried in the Oakland cemetery by whose side the remains of her husband were interred yesterday morning after services at the home of his daughter conducted by Rev. J. B. Workman, of the M. E. church. Mr. Porter is survived by seven children, they being Miss Mary E., and George T., of Oakland; Mrs. C. Felty, of Connellsville, Pa.; Lee, of Nevada; Charles C., of Cumberland; Mrs. Martha Keen, of Baltimore county, and Mrs. D. Grant Smith, of Grafton, all of whom, with the exception of Lee were present at the funeral. In addition to those named above Mr. Porter had another daughter, Miss Margaret, who died last summer.

Struck By a Stone.

Master Leslie Loar, son of Mr. and Mrs. L. L. Loar, of Washington street, was struck on the head by a stone thrown by some unknown party, last evening, and received a cut that, while not dangerous, will keep him in the house several days. It is supposed that the rock was thrown by some boys at play, and doubtless the person who threw it is not yet aware that the missile struck and inflicted a wound.—Grafton Sentinel.

MR. STEPHEN BROWNING VERY ILL.

He Was Paralyzed Yesterday and His Family has no Hope for His Recovery.

Mr. Stephen Browning, one of the old and highest esteemed farmer residents of this section of Garrett county, is lying extremely ill at his home a few miles south of Oakland.

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Browning suffered a paralyetic stroke, which affected his entire left side. He is seventy-two years of age, and is the son of the late John L. Browning and grandson of Mesheck Browning, the pioneer hunter and settler of Garrett county.

Mrs. Browning arrived at the bedside of her husband Tuesday afternoon from Indianapolis, Ind., in which city she has been receiving treatment for several weeks for a cancerous growth in her side.

At 11.45 o'clock, this morning, just as this form is going to the press a telephone message from Mr. Browning's home conveys the information that he is dead, having expired at 11.30 o'clock.

BITTINGER.

An unseasonable snow and wind storm has been raging in this section for one week, the entire period being marked by the absence of sunshine and at this writing the roads are obstructed by huge snow drifts equal to any of the past winter.

Daniel Orendorf and Clark Snyder, of Mt. Lake Park, drove down to this village last Saturday afternoon and spent Sunday with Mr. Orendorf's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Elias Orendorf, but were forced to leave their buggy and return on horseback Monday.

Ward Beachy, of Grantsville, was in this place last week doing some paper hanging and painting. While here Ward "told us a few" and we hope he will come to our village again.

C. E. Ellithorp received and distributed a car load of fertilizers last Monday.

"Cub" Ryman an employee of Jennings Bros., who has resided near this place for some time, removed to Jennings last week.

The Normal at this place did not open on last Monday morning as had been announced on account of Prof. King's inability to reach here in time. He arrived however, on Monday evening and opened the school on Tuesday with a good attendance.

John H. Stark purchased a team of fine young horses last week of Truman Wilt.

Jacob Brenneman received a car load of fertilizer from Baltimore early this week.

Rev. J. B. Shoup, who has been suffering from a severe cold for several days, sufficiently recovered to serve his people at Meadow Mountain charge last Sunday.

HE WAS SHOT IN THE LEG SATURDAY.

Constable Miller, at Deer Park, Wounded Michael Madigan.

Last Saturday afternoon Michael Madigan, of Deer Park, was shot in the fleshy part of his leg by Constable E. G. Miller, of District No. 10, inflicting a flesh wound of a slight nature.

Concerning the occurrence which led up to the shooting it is stated that Constable Miller and Bailiff M. V. Flanigan, of Deer Park, had under arrest and on the way to the town lock-up, one Nelson Wood, for being drunk and disorderly. Madigan, along with four other men of Deer Park, all of them more or less under the influence of whiskey, attempted to rescue Wood from the officers. They were warned to keep away but Madigan persisted in advancing upon the officers. Constable Miller drew his revolver and shot over Madigan's head in order to frighten him but he jumped for the officer instead of retreating when the second shot was fired which inflicted the wound.

The injured man walked to his home and was attended by a surgeon who located the bullet and extracted it.

Since the row the other men implicated in the affair have left that section of the county.

No arrests followed the shooting but it is probable that the grand jury will investigate the matter.

A UNIQUE RECORD.

Married at 14; Divorced at 16 and Wedded Again at 17.

A marriage license was issued by the County Clerk at Fairmont, W. Va., to A. R. Kelley and Roxie Clayton. The age of the prospective groom is 23 and that of the bride is 17.

Now it is not a strange thing for a young woman at the romantic age of 17 to get married in that country, but old court house officials say that never in their career have they seen a 17 years' old girl with the initial "D" marked after her name on the marriage record.

The "D" stands for "divorced" and a look at the chancery record books shows that during February of last year she was divorced from her husband, John Mike, for statutory reasons. The record show that she was first married on May 18th, 1904, at a time when she was not more than 14 years old. She has quite a unique record. Married at 14: divorced at 16 and married again at 17.

Her home is at Mannington and her right to get married was approved by her mother, Mrs. Ella Furbee

The International Sunday School Lesson.

Second Quarter. Lesson III. Gen. xxxvii, 5-28. April 21, 1907.

Copyright, Davis W. Clark.

Joseph Sold By His Brothers.

The inevitable and grevious consequences of polygamy were upon Jacob. Even the blessing at Jabbok could not avert, though it may have mitigated them. That experience, no doubt, made the patriarch more patient and just under his extremely trying circumstances. But his home, if it deserved the name of home at all, was rent with jealousy. Four wives and four sets of children kept the camp in pandemonium. . . . Under the most favorable circumstances the rearing of twelve sons is an operose task. At the very time Jacob should have been giving his undivided attention and strength to it, he seems to have been chiefly engaged in outwitting Laban and accumulatiug a fortune. The result was, he had a lot of unruly, wicked boys on his hands, who made his name unsavory among the inhabitants of the land. . . . On the dark background of this polygamous household the pure and artless character of Joseph emerges with most pleasing effect. He was the son of Jacob later and better days. He was taken away soonest from the degrading influences of Padanaram. He was chastened by the greatest grief that can befall a young heart, a mother's death. The very frequency and completeness with which his surroundings changed was calculated to cultivate the devout and dependent spirit. . . . From the thorny and thistly sons of Jacob grapes and figs could not be expected. The extreme cruelty, especially of Simeon and Levi, had already shown itself in the case of the Shechemites. All were rude, treacherous Bedouin. The gentle and pure character of Joseph was a standing stricture upon them. They were envious of his impending honor; ready to cry as their descendants afterwards did: "We will not have this man to reign over us." They nursed their jealousy until it reached the size of murder. . . . Joseph had come to them on an errand of love from his father. It was a long and perilous journey from Hebron to Dothan. There were Bedouin and bears in the way. He had brought his brothers goodly viands. If there was to be any criticism of their conduct on his part, direct or indirect, it would be just, and for their real advantage. But they allowed themselves be moved with envy. Their utter heartlessness is shown in that they could sit down to the very banquet he had brought them, and eat it in sound of his wailing voice. . . . Amos compassionately refers to the "sufferings of Joseph." They were pitiful, unparalelled. He was treated with indignity; stripped of his robe of state; taunted with his dreams; cast into a demijohn-shaped cistern, from which escape was impossible. There, in the mire and clay of a horrible pit, he shivered for want of his cloak. He was a-hungered and weary, with no place to lay his head. He was treading the wine-press of sorrow alone, and of his brothers there was none to help him. At length he is lifted from the pit, but only to suffer a worse fate. . . . There is an expulsive power in a new vice as well as a new virtue. Murder is ousted by avarice. The sight of the approaching trading caravan suggests the possibility of making merchandise of this obnoxious brother. A moment later they gloat over their two silver shekels apiece, and see their kinsman, according to the flesh, depart to ignominious and hopeless servitude. . . . Naked and under a burning sun, with an iron collar about his neck and a lash upon his back, the heir of all the promises departs from the very land he was to have inherited. The prince is metamorphosed into the slave, Canaan exchanged for Egypt. From the human angle all is lost; but "God moves in a mysterious way,

His wonders to perform."

Analysis and Key.

1. Evil of polygamy illustrated in Jacob's family.
   Pandemonium.
2. Jacob busy getting a fortune—sons neglected—result.
3. Joseph on background of polygamous household.
   Son of Jacob's better days.
   Soonest removed from pagan environment.
   Chastened by mother's death.
4. Character of Joseph standing rebuke to his brothers.
   Nursed their jealously.
5. Opportunity afforded by Joseph's visit to camp.
   Expulsive power of a new vice.
   Murder vs. avarice.
   Joseph sold a slave.
6. Defeat in appearance only.

The Teacher's Lantern.

This fascinating story is a thin veil through which the most cursory reader must catch a glimpse of the character and work of Jesus. A greater Father sends His greater Son. It is an errand of love and mercy. He brings bread and wine, emblems of his own sacrifice and oblation. He comes to His own, but His own received Him not. He is sold at the price of a slave, He is shockingly humiliated; smitten and mocked; stripped of his robe; put to a slave's death; entombed; but now He appears upon a throne of glory to give redemption to all—as many as will believe upon His name. Thus is Joseph one of the most striking types of Jesus.

* * * * *

Joseph's rescue would have been the greatest possible misfortune. For himself: to have been reared in Canaan by his fond father would have made a Lilliputian of him. For his nation: Egypt was to be their schoolhouse, and Joseph's captivity was the means of bringing them there. This does not discount the brother's crime. God made their wrath to praise him, and the excess of it, which would have murdered the heir of the promises, he restrained.

* * * * *

A reverse! so it seemed when the heir-apparent to Israel's throne became a slave. But whether an event is a reverse or not depends upon what God means by it, and the use man makes of it. If Joseph had become a man-hater, and spent his time bewailing his confessedly hard lot, his going a slave to Egypt would have been a reverse. On the contrary, he triumphed over untoward circumstances. By his industry and fidelity he made himself indispensable to Potiphar, the prison-keeper, and finally to Pharaoh himself.

* * * * *

A little span the triumph of evil covers at best. The malignant brothers are in fine feather over making away with the object of their enmity. They are glad they will see the face of the dreamer and "reporter" no more. But in a score of years they are fulfilling the dream, and bowing timorously before his blazing throne. The wicked spread themselves like the bay, but suddenly they are not. Malice is impotent when it rears itself against Providence.

* * * * *

That fine coat! How soon it was stripped off! Joseph was just as good and great without it. It is character, not clothes, that wins.

* * * * *

Reuben was imitating Jacob in finesse. He expected to get his brother out of the hole. But the success of neither father nor son in cunning is sufficient to encourage imitation. Reuben's kindly feeling toward his rival is commendable; but perhaps if he had courageously withstood his brothers, it would have been a case where one consciously in the right would have put nine, consciously in the wrong, to flight.

* * * * *

A further hint of Joseph's character is found in the descriptive phrase, "A child of the old ones." He had an old head on young shoulders; preferred the company of his elders; spent much time, no doubt, with his grandfather Isaac.

* * * * *

As in his father, so in him, there may have sprung up the ambition to inherit the primogenitureship; unlike his father, however, he took no unworthy means to help Providence secure the desired end.

* * * * *

The primogenitureship passed from the first son by Leah to the first son by Rachel. To attest the fact, Jacob put an uncommon and lovely robe of state upon the heir apparent. With the zeal of a reformer, the embryo priest and ruler at once reported to his father the uncomely acts of his broihers, only with a view to having them amended. He was aggrieved that the fair name of the holy nation should be tarnished by such sins. He felt that the very perpetuity of the tribe, and all the oracles of God committed to it, were imperiled.

BLOOMINGTON.

Rev. Snedegar has been returned to the pastorate of the Bloomington circuit.

Mr. Andrew Mullen, one of our oldest residents and most esteemed citizens, celebrated his 82nd birthday on Monday.

A cocking main, attended by quite a crowd of prominent sporting men from Cumberland, Barton, Lonaconing and this town, took place in this vicinity on last Saturday afternoon. The fighting ground was on the W. Va. side and considerable money changed pockets in the result. About a dozen roosters were handled by the promoters of the fight, many of which fell victims to the keen and cruel gaff. A Bloomington bird carried off the honors and a majority of the victories, having not less than six birds to his credit, which brought to the owner, besides the purse, a number of side bets which netted quite a nice little sum of money. The days sport however was not until John Barleycorn had arranged a couple of scraps on the Maryland side with bybreds of different kind. No money changed hands on these results, but the complexions and features of the participants show a very decided and marked change.

"It's a boy" was the announcement that greeted Mr. Jesse Harris early last Wednesday morning, when the little youngster came to be a member of his family.

Mr. "Bun" Warnick, of Hitchcock's Tunnel, a B. & O. watchman on the seventeen mile grade for the last 40 years, who has been quite sick for the past four or five weeks, is improving and expects to resume his usual duties in a short time.

Hugh Tate, of Cumberland, was here on Saturday.

Mrs. Charles Brendlin, who has been quite ill for the past three weeks is is reported in an improved condition.

Mrs. Abernathy and her daughter, Beryl, of Beryl, W. Va., entertained Mr. Fred Hartman and mother, of Barnum, on last Sunday.

Several changes have occurred in the addition and subtraction of our population in the last week. Mr. Will Wildman, a native born and a resident for years, moved his family to Blaine, where he purchased a home some time ago. Mr. William Barnard moved from Big Vein last Monday, and is occupying a house with his father, Otho Barnard.

The water works company with a large force of men have about completed the laying of the large mains.

The man with the early hoe has stopped to consider.

A frame dwelling house, on Nob Hill owned by the Davis Coal & Coke Co., and occupyed by John Parker engineer on the Dinkey railroad, was burned to the ground with all its contents early last Sunday morning. The fire is thought to be of incendiary origin as Mr. Parker left home the evening before to visit his mother, who makes her home with a married daughter in Cumberland. Mr. Parker first heard of his loss late Tuesday afternoon.

The county road between this place and Luke hill, on the Allegany side, is still quite impassible. A huge landslide, east of the Buxton mine, has deposited a layer of soft, sticky clay on the road, about 20 to 30 feet wide and 3 feet deep, that renders travel by horseback or vehicle extremely dangerous. Those patrons who have business over the road are loud in their complaints and denunciation of the action of the road supervisors in not removing the obstacle and opening the highway. Some have threatened to call the attention of the grand jury to the condition of affairs and see what relief can be obtained from that body.

The latest news from Mr. John Raley, who reported to the Roanoke management two weeks ago for practice preparatory to the opening of the regular base ball season, is highly satisfying to his many friends and admirers in this place. John has set a fast pace for the Virginia boys and the Roanoke's are giving him the warmest kind of a welcome. The Roanoke Times in this week's issue prints a good picture of the clever first baseman in his characteristic pose, with a very complimentary notice.

BETTY'S ENGAGEMENT.

By Leslie Holmes.

Copyright, 1907, by Leslie Holmes.

Betty rode in the elevator nearly every day. Allen Johnson ran the elevator every day and knew all about Betty.

In fact, he was pretty sure that any girl who got off regularly at the sixth floor and turned to the right was bound for the room whose door carried this legend:

JAMES CONVERSE.
Theatrical Agent and Producer.
General Provider of Stage Talent.
Mobs a Specialty.

Mr. Converse's office was the sort of A B C class in stage craft where ambitious young men and women were given a chance to participate in mob scenes, court balls, hunting parties, etc., at a salary ranging from 50 cents to $1 a performance.

Converse had been in the business many years, had amassed a comfortable fortune and could point with pride to the fact that many a girl or lad who had started with him in the mob scene of a big production was now drawing a good salary as leading man or woman or was even starring.

Some one had told Betty Vincent of this fact, and so she hung on to the hope of an opening at the Converse office with the despair of a girl who finds herself compelled to earn her living without any particular preparation and who thinks the stage offers the one field where experience is not necessary.

Day after day Betty smiled and said "Good morning" to Allen, and day after day Allen watched the roses fade in her cheeks and the circles deepen around her pretty violet eyes. He saw, too, her brave struggle to keep up appearances. One day the little fur toque she wore would be covered with ribbons, again it would blossom forth in somewhat faded violets, and another day a home curled plume would fall from its left side. Allen had been landing aspirants at the Converse office just long enough to read the signs aright.

Then came a morning when he took Betty, all smiles, from the sixth floor to the first. She was the sole passenger on his car, and he ran it down very slowly.

"Yes, thank you. I'm to go on in the big ballroom scene in 'The Love of a Princess'—a dollar a night, and it will be all clear because I can wear my grandmother's wedding dress. It's a lovely brocade"—

The car came to a stop, and passengers crowded in. Betty disappeared in the crush.

"Humph!" muttered Allen to himself, giving the lever a sort of unreasonable jerk. "Have to provide their own costumes. That doesn't look as if the management was rolling in money. Guess I'll look it up."

By night Allen knew all about the company and the management of "The Love of a Princess." He wanted to hunt up Betty, who he knew would come no more to the Empire building. Then he changed his mind and, instead, glared at the manager of the company, who rode at times in his car.

"Let her have her fling," he said to himself. "She's got to have it, and no talking of mine will convince her."

Nevertheless that night when Betty came out of the big hall where the rehearsals were being held Allen was waiting for her.

She looked surprised, but he tucked her arm through his in brotherly, protecting fashion.

"You might as well get used to stage door admirers," he said, with a laugh. "Got to have 'em, you know. Anyhow, I live up your way, and it's no time of night for a girl to be out alone."

That was the beginning of his curious guardianship. When the rehearsals were transferred from the hall to the theater he was more vigilant than ever, and somehow he so ingratiated himself with the old doorkeeper that he was permitted to sit back on a pile of stage "props" and watch the rehearsals. Sometimes Betty wondered why he was so grave when they started homeward. She did not know that the worldwise Allen had ushered in this same theater for many months and knew a "frost" when he saw it, even in rehearsal. But he did not contradict her when she rattled on about the wonderful things she intended to do for her half invalid mother on that $8 a week, for "The Love of a Princess" was to have two matinees a week.

The night of the dress rehearsal Allen sat watching her with hungry eyes. Almost he wished that he had tried for the position of "walking gentleman" just to promenade the stage with that vision in soft old lavender brocade on his arm. Then his eyes snapped, and when Betty came off he whispered:

"Take off that lace thingumbob and carry it home with you."

Betty looked surprised, but she had learned to defer to his suggestions, and so, when she came out in her long, rough coat and fur toque she carried the lace bertha under her arm.

"That is what makes the dress look so pretty," she urged. "It's real lace."

"Yes, I saw that," answered Allen, "but some five cent a yard stuff will do for stage wear, and if some of them got wise to the fact you had real lace they'd cop it and pawn it. Say, you don't know anything yet about life behind the scenes."

At first Betty had felt inclined to resent Allen's espionage, but he was a good looking chap, and she soon found, especially after the first night, when she was the only one of the "extra ladies" to receive flowers—violets that must have cost several dollars—that his regular attendance upon her made her the envy of many fellow players.

The papers gave the new production bad notices, but the audiences continued large, especially in the orchestra, and Betty remained hopeful.

"Paper," said Allen in disgust as he watched the audience gather on Thursday night. And he was right. The house was being filled on passes. "The Love of a Princess" was a failure.

But Betty, watching the big audiences, could not be persuaded—not until Saturday night came, when the company was called together and dismissed without salaries.

Betty was very quiet and white when she came out, her grandmother's frock under her arm.

"It's all over," she said sadly. "You were right. And—and we didn't even get one week's salary. There's all my car fare, and my new slippers, and a bill at the druggist's. Mother's cough has been so much worse"—

Allen's firm clasp closed over her trembling hand.

"There, there, don't you worry. I saw it coming before the first night even, and my brother, who's got a good thing in the Daniels Realty company, is going to put you in there to mind the switchboard. Tomorrow's Sunday, and he'll take time to show you how to run it, so when you start in Monday you won't seem green. It's eight a week to start and something better ahead, 'cause you've got a pull, see?"

"Oh, you are so kind to me! I don't see why"—

Betty was half sobbing.

Allen looked down upon her drooping head in speechless amazement. Girls certainly were queer things, he argued. Hadn't he shown her plainly enough? He cleared his throat, but his voice remained husky.

"Don't you know—ain't you seen—that I loved you—loved you from the first day you came into my car? But I wasn't going to tell you just yet—not until I got a better job. The first of the year I'm going into the advertising line with that firm on the tenth floor, and then— Say, have you seen those model flats up on West Eighty-seventh street? I think that sunlight from the south court would be grand for your mother, and if you get an advance and the advertising business pans out we might"—

Goodness, was she never going to stop crying? Was this the way girls always behaved when men proposed to them?

Suddenly the brocaded dress fell at his very feet, and before he could pick it up Betty's two hands clasped on his arm, and her eyes, raised to his, shone like two violets bathed with dew.

"Oh, Allen, you are perfectly grand! If the princess had had a love like yours, the show never would have closed."

And then— But never mind. Some policemen are very tactful, and the one who was strolling their way turned his back and picked up the brocade dress that was rolling straight for the gutter.

"Fox Hunting" In 1700.

Two or three hundred years ago any one who said he had been "fox hunting" would have laid himself open to a misconception of which there is no longer danger in a modern November. According to the "Dictionary of the Canting Crew" (about 1700), "he has caught a fox" meant "he is very drunk," and this is what a writer meant in 1599 when he observed that "whoever loves good wine hunts the fox once a year." "Foxed" signified drunk, and to "fox" a man was to make him so. Pepys records that he "almost foxed" Dr. Thomas Pepys with Margate ale. Was the original idea that of playing a foxy trick on a man? Or, as one passage half suggests, that of painting his nose a foxy red?—London Chronicle.

A Plea For Poetry.

If poetry be a relic of barbarism and science the highest expression of human thought, let us by all means remain barbarians to the extent at least of being emotionally moved occasionally. Let us hope that the [illegible] far distant when man will be merely a cold, calculating, scientific machine so admirably constructed that emotionalism, love, human sympathy and similar relics of barbarism will have no place in his mentality.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

PROFESSOR L. H. BAILEY.

I lie on my back on the shingle shore
Subdued by the wind and the pebbly roar;
I see the white clouds in their domes of air
And the specks of birds that are floating there;
And the earth is small and the sky is large—
I forget the sense of my time and charge;
I am lost in awe of the Great Programme—
Only this I know: I know that I am.

The wild earth it is swinging afree from its place,
It is rolling adrift on the limitless space,
It is sailing away past cerulean bars,
It is passing the moon and the sun and the stars;—
And the wind and the wind it is following fast,
And the sunshine and shadow are scurrying past,
And white cloud shafts are pointing with fingering streams
That are caught and are lost in the myths of my dreams.

Oh carry me out to the bold deep sky,
Oh blow me away through the blue,—
I will snatch the years as they hasten by
And scatter their days as the dew:
For the years and years are but shapes profound
That are bred in the depths sublime,
And that ride and ride in their fruitless round
On the perishing wings of Time.

Oh carry me out where the starlights burn,
Where the world stuff billows and sweeps,—
I will grasp the orbs as they pass in turn
And fling them adrift on the deeps:
For the worlds and worlds may vanish as air,
And schemes of the universe fall,
Yet will I fly to some vast Otherwhere
And hold my domain Over All.

A WISE POSITION.

New York State Grange Refused to Indorse Specific Legislative Measures.

The thirty-fourth session of the New York state grange was marked by one important step in advance that distinguished it from any former meetings. This was the determination not to indorse any specific legislative bill by name. The past experience of the state grange has taught us that it is dangerous to indorse a bill by name and then allow it to be amended out of all semblance to the measure which the grange indorsed. This very thing has happened on many former occasions, and this year the state grange decided at the outset to indorse no specific bill by name, but instead to enunciate the principles which it desired enacted into legislation and leave the lawmakers to frame it into law.

The question of school supervision occupied much of the time and attention of the delegates, at least three committees having resolutions bearing on this subject. As finally disposed of the state grange placed itself on record as favoring a better supervision of schools and an educational qualification for school commissioners, but did not indorse the Page bill, which abolishes the office of school commissioner and creates a new officer to be known as school superintendent at an increased salary. The action of the grange on this question was conservative and, we believe, reflects the sentiment of the best class of farmers everywhere.

National Legislative Committee.

The legislative committee of the national grange has had two or three sessions this winter with congressional committees in reference to certain legislation in which the grange is specially interested. It put in some hard work against the ship subsidy measure, Past National Master Jones making a strong argument in opposition to the bill at a meeting called ostensibly to discuss the extension of our commerce with foreign nations, but which was really in the interest of the ship subsidy scheme. The committee also urged with much force the amendment to the denatured alcohol bill which permits farmers to operate their own distilleries.

NOT VERY LADYLIKE.

Some of the editors seem to feel that it is not quite nice and ladylike of Teddy to call a liar by his right name. Especially do the boys who write leading editorials for the democratic organs define the limitations of official dignity of a President with scientific precision. They deeply deplore "the frequency with which President Roosevelt feels called upon to raise the question of veracity in regard to matters of fact". It does not strike them as "quite in goo dtaste, don't you know?"

There are, to be sure, some disadvantages connected with such plain speaking. Doubtless these disadvantages have the attention of Burton, Harriman et al. as well as the democratic editors. It may be all right to call a spade a spade, but there are lots of people who get nervous when they see the big stick used as a club.

RUBBING IT IN.

At a banquet of the Bryan Anniversary Club at Chatanooga the other night a most sensational thing took place. John Temple Graves, editor of the Atlanta Georgian, sent a letter declining to speak because the toastmaster had requested him not to talk about his suggestion that Bryan should nominate Roosevelt for reelection. Bryan insisted on hearing Graves' speech, and the editor finally decided to deliver it. In closing, he said:

"We should not rebuke the spirit of spoils and the hunger of faction. We should affirm our principles, confess our faith, recite the necessity of the reform of corporative capital as the supreme and transcendent issue of the times, pay tribune to the great and typical American who has proved himself the dauntless and conquering captain of the people's causes, and then in that great convention of our own, William Jennings Bryan, the unmatched and incomparable evangelist of our faith, speaking for the whole plain people of the republic, should put in nomination Theodore Roosevelt for one more undisputed term of power to finish the work that he has so gloriously begun." In beginning his address, Bryan complimented Graves in the highest manner for his honesty and boldness. Turning directly to the subject of Graves' recommendation, Bryan said:

"As at present advised, I shall not present the name of Theodore Roosevelt to the national Democratic convention. Bear in mind, I say, as at present advised."

Bryan contended that, if, after consideration and reflection and the presentation of the arguments in the case he should consider that direction, he would present Roosevelt's name if it should prove the last act of his life. He then went on to say that if any Republican was to be selected by the Democrats to head their national ticket, the man should be Senator LaFollette, of Wiconsin. Bryan then proceeded with his speech, presenting reasons why, in his opinion Roosevelt was not the proper man for the presidency.

It is understood, however, that Mr. Bryan's arguments against President Roosevelt were not so strong as those of Mr. Graves were for him. But anyhow that was a funny position for a Democratic editor to take in speaking at a banquet of a Democratic leader and standing candidate for president.

Mister Brown Of Shopless Town

Behold a man of Shopless Town:
His name is Obadiah Brown.
He says the town does not improve,
But runs along its ancient groove.
He'd like to see it spread and grow,
And yet he does not help, you know.
Instead of buying things for sale
Right here in town, he's sent by mail
For many years and bought his things
From those faroff Mail Order kings.
No wonder, Obadiah Brown,
This home of yours is Shopless Town!

MR. WILLIAM A. BRYDON.

This estimable citizen and widely known gentleman, before attaining the age allotted by the Psalmist to man, died at his beautiful residence, "Borderside," in Bloomington, Md., March 27th, 1907.

Had this life terminated any day within the last few years little surprise could have been felt by those conversant with the patient's declining strength and previous condition. Perhaps a decade back appeared in his robust and healthful vitalities the alarming approach of an insidious and incurable malady, baffling eventually every loving care and human skill. Bred in the teachings and attached to the traditions of his mother church, and admonished by a calmly accepted inevitibility with the menace of disease in its incipiency, he prepared himself for and received the rights of confirmation in the Protestant Episcopal church and was supported by its services and nurtured by its comforts through the last moments of conscious life.

Mr. Brydon is survived by a widow, formerly Miss Susan Brady, a descendant of a long established and influential family of Maryland; by an accomplished daughter and six sons, and he lived to see these sons reach man's estate and occupying positions of trust and usefulness in various departments of the business world.

From early manhood he grappled with affairs at large and his active participation in governmental concerns antedates Garrett's history, having represented the maternal county in the legislature before Garrett's severance from the parent stem.

At the formation of the new county and creation of its offices he became the charter president of the Garrett School Board. His abundant qualifications and thorough administrative capacities fitted him pre-eminently to found and form the educational structure and policy of the infant county, and it is no transgression of sober conviction to say that in the long while and numerous changes to this date he was the best equipped executive and most polished administrator ever at the helm of that Board. At that early day the position was exacting and embarrassing to an extremity. He had to blaze the first pathway through a wilderness of obstructions, with but few school houses, scant apparatus, untrained teachers and means sorely inadequate to the multiplied needs, he not only met the difficulties and dealt with them wisely but in assemblages of the most advanced dignitaries of the State he ranked well and reflected credit upon his county. In a strict construction of the term Mr. Brydon was a gentleman of exalted personal traits, deservedly popular in his county and State, with few, if any, numbering more or warmer friends. In representative gatherings he was always a leader, and in the clashes of heated debate a foeman of formidable resources and a parliamentarian richly versed in precedents. At the head of a Graud Jury he was regarded as matchless, quickly divining the worth of the witness and with amazing directness and rapidity extracting the essentials of his testimony without disparagement to justice and with laudable dispatch of the public business.

Mr. Brydon was a friend of responsive sympathies and strong fellowship, with an individuality so pronounced as to leave its tincture upon his every expression and its visible imprint upon his every act.

The encroachments of a wasting fatality were so gradual as to mercifully permit him without pain to descend daily nearer the border line of the Master's Kingdom, and in absolute freedom from effort, to exchange the mortal for the immortality in the realm of perfect Life. And, to reproduce the beautiful benediction so impressively rendered after his body had been laid to rest,

"Father, in Thy gracious keeping Leave we now Thy servant sleeping."

MARYLAND COKE.

Experiments Being Made With Garrett County Coal.

Experiments are being made with coal taken from along White Rock creek, on the northern border of Garrett county, with a view to testing its value for coke. A plant of 32 ovens is in contemplation.

Garrett, with its thousands of acres of untouched coal, is believed to be the coming coal county in Maryland. Many mines in Alleghany county have been worked out. If ovens are erected in the White Rock Creek district, they will be the first to be used to coke Maryland coal.

SUGGESTED FOR STATE EXECUTIVE

In Intimation That Pearre Would Like to Be Stung by Gubernatoital Bee.

The following special dispatch from Hagerstown appeared in Sunday's issue of the Baltimore Sun:

"Congressman George A. Pearre may be the Republican nominee for Governor. In the past few days his name has been frequently mentioned in connection with the office by prominent Republicans in Washington county.

"Today the Herald, the Republican organ in Washington county, and a strong Pearre supporter, suggested that he be nominated for Governor. In an editorial the Herald says:

"Col. George A. Pearre is, perhaps, the most available man among the distinguished Republicans of Maryland for Governor. There can be no question as to his fitness and qualifications for the place.

"The Republican party in nominating Colonel Pearre would submit to the electorate of Maryland a man known, trusted and respected throughout the state. Five successive terms he has been elected to Congress from the Sixth Congressional district, and his last election showed him to be stronger in the confidence and affections of his constituency than when he first entered Congress. He has been a most active and earnest representative and is regarded the leading Republican member of the House of Representatives from the South.

"Time and again Colonel Pearre has shown himself possessed to an eminent degree of those qualifications that are essential to the successful candidate.

"His health is completely restored and his old-time vigor and energy have returned to him, and he is in prime physical condition for a brilliant and successful canvass of the state, should he receive the nomination.

"As Governor, George A. Pearre will be acceptable to the party in all sections of the state. As Governor, George A. Pearre, brilliant, courteous, possessing social qualities of high degree, earnest and intelligent as a statesman, devoted to the people and familiar with needs—would fulfill the best traditions of the Executive Mansion at Annapolis and satisfy the demands of a people, proud of the Commonwealth."

"It is generally regarded here that that announcement made in to-day's Herald was with the consent of Colonel Pearre. Why Washington county was selected as the place for the announcement is not known. Some persons believe that the announcement would have first appeared in the Republican organ in Allegany county—the Cumberland News—but that last summer the News, which is controlled by the Lowndes element, was bitterly opposed to the renomination of Colonel Pearre and supported Lloyd Lowndes, jr., for Congress.

"Until today it was generally thought that Colonel Pearre had aspirations to become chief judge of this circuit. Many of his close friends here thought he would be a candidate to succeed Chief Judge A. Hunter Boyd, Democrat."

PEARRE DENIES REPORT.

CUMBERLAND, Md., April 14.—Congressman George A. Pearre, who is mentioned for the Republican nomination for Governor in Hagerstown dispatches, Republicans of Washington county having launched the boom, stated today that he he is not a candidate for the nomination and has no ambition in that direction.

He said further that he is not yet ready to announce his future political plans other than to state that he has no intention of abandoning his Congressional career. He added that if he ever did conclude to give up his Congressional career his ambition would be along the line of his profession—the law.

Further than this Colonel Pearre would say nothing, except that he was very grateful to his Washington county friends for their flattering indorsement of him for the exalted office of Governor.

Colonel Pearre's statement that were he an aspirant for an office other than Representative in Congress, which position he now holds, it would be along the line of his profession, is taken to mean that he might be a candidate for the nomination for Chief Judge to succeed Judge A. Hunter Boyd. Colonel Pearre did not say that he was a candidate for judge, but it is thought he is looking in that direction. He intimated he would continue active in Allegany, as well as Sixth district, politics. His hand shown at the recent meeting of the Republican State Committee, when he landed the secretaryship for Mr. Irvin R. Dickey, of Cumberland, who is Colonel Pearre's law partner. Colonel Pearre says there was no contest in the meeting of the Republican State Central Committee, despite some intimation to the contrary, and that the members from the Sixth district were very much pleased over the selection of Mr. Dickey.

It is stated here that Mr. Lloyd Lowndes and his friends are training with a view to capturing the delegation to the Republican State Convention It is said also to be the ambition of the Lowndes faction to get control of the Republican organization in this county this year, both the State central and the county committee. Mr. Lowndes' control of the organization, his friends believe, would be helpful to his candidacy for the Republican nomination for Congress. He is expected to be in the fight again next year.

Republicans have already commenced to line up actively in the fight for county nominations, which will be by the Crawford county system. The greatest interest will be centered in the contest between F. Brooke Whiting and David A. Robb for the nomination for State's Attorney.

It has been a long time since a political announcement such as that concerning Colonel Pearre today caused so much discussion in political circles in Allegany county.

Odd Fellows' Anniversary.

The anniversary of Oak Lodge I. O. O. F., of Mountain Lake Park will be observed on Friday evening, April 26th, at 7.30 o'clock when appropriate services will be conducted in the Loch Lynn Heights United Brethren church. All members of the local lodge are earnestly requested to be present and others who are non-members will be cordially welcome.

Resolutions of Condolence.

The following resolutions on the death of Mrs. Emma Kilmer, of Crellin, were adopted at a recent meeting of the Crellin Chapter, Epworth League, and are published in response to a request from the committee appointed to draft the same:

WHEREAS, It has pleased Our Heavenly Father to remove from our Chapter one of our members in the person of our sister, Mrs. Emma Kilmer, one of our most devout and faithful members;

AND WHEREAS, She was always willing to do whatsoever she was called upon to do, being ever willing to help those in distress or want, and showing by her daily walk and life that she was a true Christian and child of God, and while she can no more answer to roll call in our Chapter here, we know she will in Heaven.

Resolved, That in the death of Sister Kilmer we recognize the visitation of Divine Providence, and while we cannot understand the mysteries, we bow in humble submission to the will of Him who doeth all things well, realizing that our loss is her eternal gain, and that she has only gone to that "Home Bright and Fair," where we may meet her again and clasp glad hands forever more; and be it further

Resolved, That we commit her husband and daughter to the love and care of Him who is a stronghold in the days of trouble, for they are not like those who have no hope for she has only gone on before and will be at the Pearly Gates to welcome them home when the Master shall call them; and be it further

Resolved, That we as a Chapter extend our deepest sympathy in this their time of sorrow, and that a copy of these resolutions be spread on the records of this Chapter, a copy be sent to the bereaved and a copy sent to the county papers for publication.

Letter to A. Shartzer.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: The cheekiest fraud in all paint is paste paint. Here's one.

Lawyer Arley B Magee, Dover, Del, painted his house four years ago with paste paint at a cost of $44 for paint and $61 for labor; total $105. The house got shabby in two years; then he painted Devoe at a very different cost; $18 for paint and $30 for labor; total [illegible] [Paste paint $105; Devoe $48.]

It is like fatting hogs on milk ¾ water. Paste paint is ¾ whitewash.

Yours truly,

The mothers this town who are responsible for the girls who gad the streets should stop to think what they are doing. These girls are no longer children. They are at the impressionable age. Where will you have their impression come from—from the riff of the street or from home? It is for the mothers of this town to settle the question.

Miss Ella Cleveland, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James O. Cleveland, has entered the employ of this office and will become a compositor in the newspaper department.

Mr. John Johns, who spent the winter in New York where he and Mrs. Johns were the guests of their son, Samuel, was in Oakland yesterday, having arrived at the Park in company with his wife last Monday.

Vic Fairall, who is employed by the Baltimore and Ohio at Rowlesburg, came home from that point on sick leave last Thursday, remaining here until Sunday when he returned, having recovered sufficiently to resume his duties.

Dr. J. W. Laughlin and daughter Miss Sada, of Mountain Lake Park, were in Oakland Tuesday when they took train No. 55 for Grafton at which point the little granddaughter of Dr. Laughlin is lying dangerously ill of typhoid fever.

Mrs. Charles A. Rinard, of Kentland, Indiana, who visited her brother Mr. Scott T. Jones, in Oakland, several days last and this week, went to Bedford, Pa., yesterday morning and will return here on Friday, later going to her home in the west.

Miss Irene Haulenbeck, who has been absent from her summer home near Deer Park since last fall, returned last Sunday. She spent the winter at her home in Baltimore and then visited relatives in Philadelphia, New York and in New Jersey. She came up on train No. 3 from Philadelphia.

Mr. Asa Day, of near Swanton, was in Oakland Monday morning when he appeared before the County Commissioners in the the interest of himself and neighbors in an endeavor to have a new county road located in a certain section of District No. 1, tapping the Barnum and Swanton road at Sweet's store in Swanton.

Dr. John G. Robinson, of Oakland, who went to Baltimore last Thursday evening, accompanied by his sisters, Mrs. M. C. Hinebaugh and Mrs. Jennie Messersmith, is response to a telegram announcing the sudden death of their father, Prof. John G. Robinson, returned to Oakland Tuesday afternoon. Mrs. Hinebaugh's return was delayed owing to a slight indisposition.

Mrs. Hermann Creutzburg, who has been in Piedmont with relatives for several weeks, was in Oakland visiting friends last Monday. From here Mrs. Creutzburg went to Cumberland. Next week she will go to Jamestown, Va., to attend the opening of the Exposition there.

Mr. R. Harry West, who was in Baltimore several days last week attending the Grand Lodge, Knights of Pythias, as a representative of the local branch of that organization, returned to his home in Oakland Saturday night. Mrs. West accompanied her husband to and from Baltimore.

Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Ravenscroft, who spent the winter with their son, Mr. Walter Ravenscroft, at Ridgeway, Pa., returned to their home in Oakland yesterday morning. Their many friends in Oakland will be pleased to learn of their presence here and to know that they are both enjoying good health.

Don't teach your children that it is a shame to wear worn and patched clothes if you are not able to afford better, but that it is no honor in wearing new ones that are not paid for. A poet said: "Remember, that rags may cover a boy who will some day be the great world's joy."

Mr. Elwood Offutt, who recently purchased the north lot of the Col. Painter property on Second street, has received plans and specifications from a Chicago architect from which a modern dwelling will be erected on the land purchased. The building will add very much to the already fine appearance of of that section of the town.

Mrs. H. C. Sincell, who has been extremely ill for the several months, was taken to Maryland University Hospital at Baltimore Tuesday night where, if deemed expedient by the surgeons, an operation for her relief will be performed. She was accompanied to Baltimore by Mr. Sincell and a nurse who has been attending her for a week past.

Messrs. H. A. Loraditch, H. A. Rasche, Bernard I. and Francis Gonder, all of Oakland, went down to Piedmont yesterday afternoon and at night were initiated into the order of Knights of Columbus, which is a large and growing secret society patronized exclusively by those holding to the Catholic faith. The gentlemen returned to Oakland this morning.

Here is a puzzle that puzzles everybody: Take the number of your living brothers, double the amount, add to it three multiply by five, add to it the number of your living sisters, multiply the result by ten, add the number of deaths of brothers and substract 150 from the result. The right figure will be the number of deaths, the middle will be the number of living sisters and the left will show the number of living brothers. Try it and see.

At the banquet given in Baltimore on Monday to the editors of Democratic papers in Maryland by the leaders of the Democratic party, the local Democratic organs were represented, the Journal by Mr. G. S. Hamill, Jr., and the Mountain Democrat by its editor, Mr. Charles A. Deffinbaugh, the latter returning home Tuesday afternoon suffering with an attack of the grip and has since been compelled to remain at his home.

Mr. John W. Stanton and daughter, and Mr. and Mrs. Patick Stanton, all of Chicago, arrived here last Thursday night from their home to attend the funeral of their relative, Miss Kate Stanton, which took place Friday morning at ten o'clock. Mr. and Mrs. Stanton returned to their home Friday afternoon, followed on Saturday evening by Mr. John Stanton, whose daughter will remain in this section for a week visiting relatives.

Miss Nell Offutt, who has been under treatment for several months in the University Hospital in Baltimore, where she underwent a severe surgical operation shortly after Christmas, returned to her home in Oakland Monday evening, being accompanied by her sister, Miss Bess Offutt, who was in Baltimore several weeks, and a nurse. Miss Offutt's condition is eminently satisfactory to her relatives and friends, all of whom will be glad to hear of her return home.

The reported assault upon and robbery of Mr. James Stephen, son of County Commissioner Peter J. Stephen, alleged to have been committed on last Sunday night at a point in Election District No. 11 near Judge Elias Merrill's store, when the young man was relieved of a watch, bank book and other valuables, was circulated by some irresponsible party. County Commissioner Stephen stated to us yesterday that the report was entirely without foundation.

We have just been thinking about present day "hobbies" and they create within us a longing for the return of the good old days of our forefathers; days when the calloused hands warmly clasped each other and kid gloves were unknown; days when at eventide the family gathered at the old place and enjoyed the pleasures of home. How different now. Take the average family today and the servant girl is usually the only one home after the evening meal. The father has gone to lodge, the mother to her club, Jane to the music circle, Kate to the card party, Robert has gone down town for a game of billards, Peter to the reading room. Verily, we live in a progressive age.

MAY BECOME GRAND PRELATE

Mayor Henry W. McComas Nominated for the Office at Grand Lodge K. of P.

At the sessions of the Grand Lodge, Knights of Pythias of Maryland, held last week in Baltimore, Dr. Henry W. McComas, Mayor of Oakland, a prominent member of the Garrett Lodge No. 113, Knights of Pythias, was placed in nomination for the position of Prelate of the Grand Lodge.

This is the first time a local Pythian has been nomination for a Grand Lodge office and every endeavor will be made by Dr. McComas' friends to secnre his election at the next session of the Grand Lodge which will be held in Baltimore next April. Dr. McComas has two opponents in the race, one from Baltimore and the other a member of one of the Eastern Shore county lodges.

Should our local friend and neighbor be elected as Prelate he will be advanced successively to the position of Vice Chancellor and then to the head of the organization, Grand Chancellor, three years hence. The Western Marylanders are going into the fight to win.

IN MEMORIAM.

In sad but loving remembrance of our beloved daughter and sister, EFFIE MAY SOWERS, who died one year ago, March 30th, 1906.

When we saw our precious loved one,
Whom we tended with such cere.
Slowly fading from our presence,
How our aching hearts despaired.

She will never be forgotten,
Never shall her memory fade;
Sweetest thoughts shall ever linger
'Round the grave where she is laid.

JOHN A. SOWERS AND FAMILY.

Improvements at Sturgiss' Pharmacy.

At the old reliable drug house of Col. A. G. Sturgiss on Alder street there has recently been a number of changes made in the interior arrangement of the store. New and modern case-counters have been placed succeeding the wooden counters; a cigar case of excellent design and in keeping with the rest of the new furnishings has been installed. In front of the building and elevated at some distance from the payment will be erected an alternating lighting cigar sign which while being an advertisement will also be an ornament.

Mrs. A. D. Naylor and two children, who were guests of relatives and friends at Parkersburg, West Va., for a week, returned home Monday afternoon.

Mr. E. J. Wallace, of Oakland, a bookkeeper and penman of more than ordinary ability, has entered the employ of the Ravenscroft Lumber Company as head of the office force.

Mr. T. W. Casteel, one of our leading farmers, has just had completed at his residence on his farm north of Oakland, an acetylene gas lighting plant which will be used to light his dwelling. A. D. Naylor & Co. were the contractors.

Mr. William Frederick, of Friendsville, and his son Walter, and Mr. J. H. Hartzell, of Addison, Pa., were in Oakland Monday, having completed that day the installation of an acetylene gas plant at the farm house of Mr. J. W. Haney, a few miles north of Oakland. Mr. Frederick, Jr., is a resident of Johnstown, Pa., and is engaged in the manufacture of the gas plants at that point. He has already installed several machines at different points in this county, all of them being eminently satisfactory.

In order that a town or city may make a substantial and steady growth it must have factories so as to induce people to make their home there. People will flock where there is employment. City or public works will give employment to but few men, and that only for a portion of the year. The question of securing factories and other sources of employment must be agitated and inducements held out to either the citizens or outsiders to imvest, or at least investigate the possibilities of successfully operating plants here. As a starter, we would suggest the feasibility of some one putting in a pickle and canning factory. We feel sure that our farmers would see the benefits such an institution would be to them as well as to the town.

Church Social.

The Ladies' Aid Society of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church, will conduct a social in the basement of the church on Wednesday evening, April 24th, the object being the organization of a Young People's Society. A lunch to those attending will be served. Members of the church residing in the county and also those within the town's limits, are earnestly invited to be present and spend a pleasant evening.

Charges Against Well Known Men.

A special dispatch from Cumberland to several papers says: "Indictments were returned against A. J. Wilkinson and S. H. Somerville at Keyser, W. Va., for attempted bribery. Jacob Hollenbergar and R. A. Radcliff, members of the Mineral county school book board, testified that they were each offered $150 to vote to adopt the books of the American Book Company, which the accused represented. The grand jury recommends that contracts be repudiated. Wilkinson is a councilman of Grafton and is prominent."

REAPPOINTED RURAL CARRIER

Mr. Charles J. Newman Will Again Enter Employ of Government.

Mr. Charles J. Newman, who resigned as letter carrier on Rural Route No. 1 about a year ago, being succeeded by the late Frank Coddington, has been reappointed to his old position by the Postoffice Department at Washington and will resume work on the route on May 16th, 1907, his commission dating from that time.

Since the death of the regular carrier, Mr. Coddington, the route has been worked by his substitute, Oscar Turney, who is well liked by the patrons of the route.

Funeral of Miss Kate Stanton.

The funeral of Miss Kate Stanton, whose death took place last Wednesday in Baltimore, an account of which was published in this paper last Thursday, occurred on Friday morning last at ten o'clock from St. Peter's Catholic church in Oakland, when her brother, Rev. Thomas J. Stanton, of St. Joseph's church, Baltimore, conducted the services, being assisted by Rev. Quinn, of Cumberland, and Rev. Connell, of Oakland. The interment was made in the cemetery here.

Look Here.

COME IN AND GET ACQUAINTED

The Arms of the Law.

By FRANK H. SWEET.

Copyright, 1906, by Frank H. Sweet.

WHEN the daily midseason train rounded out from the palmettos, slowed across the bridge and came to a smooth, almost suave stop at the end of the Royal Poinciana, the usual people were in attendance. An orchestra in the cocoanut grove swelled out alluring strains of welcome. From the docks came the occasional creaking of yacht sails. On the Poinciana steps, the platform, in the grove, along the paths, were scarlet coats and gauzy, summerlike dresses and golf sticks.

Two private cars were in the train, but except for a casual glance they of the scarlet coats and gauzy dresses did not notice them. Multimillionaires had become a drug at Palm Beach.

"OH!" HE SAID. "GOOD MORNING."

Thus it was that the railroad magnate of a dozen millions and the copper king of three times as many walked from the cars with only the buzzing, tip loving attendance of bell boys and porters.

But the next morning the copper king, who had registered as Henry Tierman, Michigan, made a stronger plea for local recognition. He went fishing.

His own line had been thrown overboard soon after leaving the dock, but not a nibble came as an encouragement for him to persevere.

'Gettin' tired, sir?" the boatman asked.

"Rather," Tierman confessed, yawning. "I don't believe I'm much of a fisherman after all."

"That's 'cause you ain't in practice," encouragingly.

Tierman assented by a nod, and the boat was run alongside the Pitt's island dock. Tierman stepped out, lighted a cigar and sauntered away into one of the shadowy paths.

Half an hour later he found himself near a cottage which was almost concealed from the path and wholly from the water. He passed around this and down to the shore beyond. A young man was seated upon the trunk of a fallen rubber tree fishing. His hat brim was drawn far down over his eyes, as though to shield them from the sun, but no sunlight could penetrate through the density of the overhanging foliage. At the sound of approaching footsteps he started and turned.

"Oh!" he said. "Good morning."

"Good morning," Tierman responded. "Fishing to kill time, like the rest of us?"

"No, hardly that," seating himself again upon the tree trunk. "I knew little of the art two weeks ago. Since then I have fished quite a good deal."

Tierman's gaze left him and wandered out across the water. He wanted to be amused. Presently he sat down upon the trunk and made some comment about the fishing. The young man answered shortly and with a covert side glance of inquiry. But a few moments later, as though the scrutiny had been reassuring, he opened a basket at his side and took from it an extra line. This he gave to Tierman and showed him how to make a good cast.

At the Western Union office of the Poinciana the little machine which kept the guests in close touch with the outside world was clicking along industriously, and the boy who delivered the messages as they ran off was taxed not to fall behind. Occasionally an owner could not be found, and the small envelopes would be brought back and placed upon the desk, there to wait another attempt at delivery later. Two hours after the copper king left the hotel one of these was brought back with "Tierman not to be found; gone to the inlet fishing."

The operator did not look up, but with one hand he motioned the envelope from the undelivered pile.

"Seemed to be important," he said; "must be delivered at once. Go find his private secretary, his servant, anybody of his party. If not able to do that, take the message up the lake yourself."

But that was not necessary, for as the boy left the office he saw Tierman's secretary entering the rotunda from outside. In less than ten minutes the secretary was hastening up the lake at the maximum speed of the fastest launch which could be procured.

He found the copper king on the tree trunk, his face eager, his tones jovial. On the ground lay four large fish, and he had caught two of them. But at sight of his secretary and the yellow envelope his face clouded.

"Couldn't you wait till I got back?" he exclaimed testily. "Don't you know that an interruption now means bad luck? I'll not catch another fish. Here, give me the telegram!"

He read it with a gathering frown, then thrust it impatiently into his pocket.

"Wire Saunders to have extra vigilance at all the port towns and along the Canadian frontier," he grumbled. "Offer twenty thousand—fifty thousand—for the fellow's apprehension. But of course Saunders understands and has done everything that could be done. There was no use bothering me. Yes, that is all," as the secretary turned and then paused inquiringly. "You may go now. I will not be down for several hours. I want to catch another fish."

He coiled his line as the young man had shown him and threw it with all his strength. But the cast was poor, and he drew in and coiled and cast the line once more. Then he resumed his place on the log.

The young man was bending over, watching his line. Apparently he had not noticed the secretary's presence or his companion's impatience. Five minutes passed; then he drew in his line and another large fish. Tierman watched him gloomily. Another five minutes, and he, too, began to draw in his line, but it was to wind it for departure.

"I'm going to quit," he declared. "Luck's turned, and I might fish on all day now without a bite."

The young man rose.

"It's too bad," he said, "but you've made a good catch anyway. These fish will be worth showing at the hotel."

Tierman's face brightened.

"That's so," he agreed. "I'll send the boatman to get them. But if it hadn't been for that fellow I might have caught another."

"Very likely. Did he bring bad news?"

"Well, yes, in a money way," dryly. "the difference between fifty thousand and ten times that amount. You see, it was this way: A man who was buying mining property for me disappeared with what we thought about fifty thousand. That was nearly a month ago. Of course we took the usual precautions against his leaving the country. This telegram states that recent investigation has lifted the amount to half a million."

"Ah, that was quite a haul. And the fellow escaped?"

"So far, but he'll be caught all right," carelessly. "Folks don't find it easy to do such things nowadays and get off. Fifty thousand is a good bid for vigilance, and, besides, we have some of the best detectives on the lookout. Every avenue from the country is guarded."

"Perhaps he slipped out ahead of the guards."

"No; we got a clew of him at New Orleans only two weeks ago. He had engaged passage on a sailing vessel for South America, but grew suspicious and did not make his appearance. Shrewd of him, too," chuckling, "for we had a detective on board waiting for him. No, no; we'll have him all right. He's in hiding somewhere, and it's only a matter of time. But about the fishing," abruptly. "We must have some more of it together. I didn't know that I was a fisherman, but it seems I am. Now, see here. I had my steam yacht come down ahead of me. It's at Miami now. Suppose I wire the captain to run up and take us off for a few days. Will you go?"

An odd look flashed into the young man's eyes, and he turned away for a moment.

"The Mona?" he asked.

"Yes. You have heard of her?"

"Of course. I read the newspapers. You are Mr. Tierman, sometimes called the copper king of Michigan. And I have read something about the man you are looking for and formed an opinion as to his whereabouts. You see," apologetically, "we detectives are always on the watch for such things and read them up even when we don't expect to engage in them personally. I came here for quiet, but the professional instinct is easily aroused. Ah, you are ready to go. I will walk along with you."

They went up past the cottage and on through the semitropical growth to the dock where Tierman's boat was waiting. The young man walked with a quick, springing step, the dreaming listlessness gone from his eyes. As soon as the boatman had been sent back after the fish he placed a hand upon his companion's arm.

"Look here, Mr. Tierman," he said, with an odd, subtle challenge in his voice which the other did not appreciate until afterward; "I want to go into this thing."

"What—the fishing?"

"No; the finding of your man. I have a theory which I think will bring him to light, and I don't believe that any of your other arrangements will. Fifty thousand, I think you said. Is that for news of him or his apprehension?"

"Either for positive news, his apprehension or a recovery of the booty."

"I see." He took pencil and paper from his pocket as though to make notes, then went on, "From what I read in the papers you did not meet this man yourself?"

"No. I was in Europe and cabled for Saunders to engage him. I had heard, though, that he was a mining expert."

"So," apparently jotting the fact down. "Now about the Mona. She is ready to start at a moment's notice and is seaworthy, I suppose?"

"Of course. She was built only last year, and her captain has orders to be ready to start within fifteen minutes after receiving a telegram. I haven't been out in her myself yet, but the captain says she is capable of a voyage around the world. But what has that to do with the fellow Bostwicke?"

"Everything. I want the Mona's help to find him. Oh, I understand it's a rather startling proposition," at the look on the other's face, "but it's the only one that fits into my plans. You put the Mona under my charge for two weeks, and I'll engage to find your man. I'm positive I can do it. And I won't ask for a penny of compensation unless I do. Isn't that fair?"

"I suppose so," discontentedly. "But my private yacht! Let me hire a tug for you, or anything."

"Nothing but the Mona will do," positively. "Unless I can have her I will drop the job. But think of the half million, man, or we'll say four hundred and fifty thousand, with the fifty out. And I will need the Mona for only two weeks."

But still Tierman hesitated.

"It isn't so much the money," he objected, "as it is the fishing. I've planned a lot of fishing since I caught those two back there." Then his face cleared. "Suppose we have a few days in her before you go," he proposed; "then you may have the Mona and welcome. We can go out again after you get back."

"And have Bostwicke escape us while we are out?" asked the young man. "No, no, Mr. Tierman; the fishing must wait. My theory is this: Bostwicke's hope is one of the South American ports, probably Paramaribo. There he could be in close touch with the interior, where he probably has friends and where can be found a stirring future for a man of enterprise and capital and where there would be little danger from extradition papers. The Mona is swift, and I could make the run in a few days, find him and wire you. Almost before you realized the fact the mystery of Bostwicke's whereabouts would be a thing of the past."

"Oh, you can have the yacht, of course," yielded Tierman reluctantly, "but I'm unwilling to admit," candidly, "that just now I would rather catch a few more big fish than even Bostwicke. But here comes the boatman. I will give you a note to the captain of the Mona, and you can go down to Miami on the evening train."

"No; a better plan will be for you to wire for him to steam this way at once," said the young man hastily. "I have a little business to attend to and will then take a launch and meet him down opposite Lantana or Boynton. Have you a good description of this man Bostwicke? Though, of course," with affected indifference, "I have a general idea from reading the papers."

"Then you know as much as I do. But why not run down to Miami? It wouldn't delay you any, I think, and the police there could give you information and very likely show you a picture of the fellow."

But the young man laughed.

"I'd rather not, thank you," he said. "Too many fingers in the broth, you know. Perhaps it's professional jealousy, but I'd rather go through this thing alone. Well, wire just as soon as you can. I'll be ready to start in a few hours."

"FORGOT TO ASK YOUR NAME."

The copper king stepped on board, and the boatman raised and swung his sail into the wind. Then as they bore away from the dock: "Oh, say, I forgot to ask your name. What shall I wire?"

"Alson—Mr. Alson," the young man called across the widening space, "and wire the captain that I'll bear straight down the coast. You'll hear from me inside of two weeks."

He was better than his word. Only eight days had passed when Tierman received the expected message. Though it brought the information promised, the copper king's face clouded as his eyes ran over the lines, and when he finished he muttered discontentedly: "Too bad! Too bad! We'll not go fishing together after all." The message read:

The man is here and is willing to give up his booty. Indeed, he is very glad of the chance. Two weeks' isolation with himself brought some very pertinent thoughts. However, he felt that he must escape and that he could not live in exile without the means of subsistence. So he turned detective and went in search of himself. Of course he brought the reward along. The other four hundred and fifty thousand will be found in a tin box two feet underground at the northeast corner of the Seminole hut on Pitt's island. The Mona left here yesterday, and I strike into the interior this afternoon. Your wellwisher. ALSON BOSTWICKE.

Paramaribo, March 30, 1900.

P. S.—I am sorry about the fishing.

HORTICULTURISTS MEET.

Talk Among Practical Fruit Men of New Jersey.

Following the usual custom, numerous practical questions were asked at the recent annual meeting of the New Jersey State Horticultural society, and they were answered by the members out of their own experiences.

In reply to the query, "What is the best blackberry to grow for market?" Mr. Lovett said the Ward is very similar to Mersereau, but is much the better to grow, as it is much more prolific than the Mersereau and is the best one to grow for commercial purposes.

As to apple blight, Mr. Bancroft believed it is not as fatal as pear blight, but is said to be of the same kind.

Question: "Has any one cultivated the huckleberry?" Mr. Black stated that no one has ever cultivated it, but there is no reason why this should not be done, as in the case of any other fruit.

"What is the best way to eradicate curculios?" Mr. Baird said they may be checked by shaking or jarring off and destroying the insects. This should be done each morning. Mr. Whitehead said, "We have found that by spraying with paris green and bordeaux we get rid of a great many."

"When should spraying for the codling moth be done?" Mr. Bancroft stated, "In apple growing we spray as soon as the bloom falls and again in two weeks. On late apples we spray late in July to catch the late crop of moths." Mr. Collins advised, "Do not spray when the tree is in full bloom, as it will kill the bees."

To keep Kieffer pears from being cloudy, the only way, according to Mr. Heister, is to keep the trees open. This, however, is very hard to do. As soon as the tree is laden with fruit it becomes compact and excludes the air. A free circulation of air will prevent this trouble in a measure.

The question of "the best methods of preventing ripe rot in peaches" brought the information from Mr. Baird that J. H. Hale goes through his orchard and gathers all the affected fruit and limbs and removes them from the orchard. Mr. Brown said bordeaux mixture has been found to check ripe rot, and plums on which sodium benzoid was used were left free from rot.

Orlando Harrison said that the York Imperial and Grimes' Golden apples have been found the most profitable on the western shore of Maryland.

A LIFTING DEVICE.

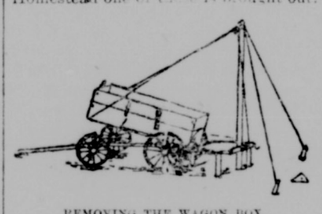
An Arrangement For Removing a Wagon Box to a Platform.

There are various ways of removing a wagon box from the trucks, and in the following plan, described in Iowa Homestead one of these is brought out:



REMOVING THE WAGON BOX.

The upright pole is 4 by 4 by 14 feet and is set several feet in the ground, so that it will be firm enough in its position to stand the strain which is required of it. The platform on which the rear end of the wagon box rests when it is to be raised from the wagon may be made any height so as to suit the height of the trucks. Two guy wires should be attached to the pole a foot or so from its top and be secured eight or ten feet in the rear of the platform. The rope which is used to do the lifting is attached at one end of the upright pole near its upper end. From there it continues on to a pulley hooked in a rope which passes around the front end of the wagon box, then back over a pulley in the top of the pole and down to a windlass at the rear end of the platform. When the wagon box is in its final position on the platform, it should stand upright and should be left attached to the rope, so that it cannot be blown down in case of winds.

Experience With Manure Spreader.

My experience with the manure spreader teaches me that the modern method of applying manure to land is far in advance of the old practice, says a writer in Farm and Fireside. In applying manure with the spreader it is put on uniformly, and all parts of the field are equally benefited. When the manure was dumped in piles, it frequently happened that the work of spreading was postponed for some time, and the result was that much of the fertilizing value of the manure leached out or was lost through fermentation. The manure spreader not only saves the plant food elements of the manure, but also saves time and labor, as the work is all done at one time. It does two very important things and does them well—it thoroughly fines the manure and distributes it evenly.

Hornless Cattle.

The time will come when horned cattle will be bred only as curiosities or for show purposes, as fancy breeds of poultry are now. The advantages of the mulleys are so many that the horns must go. It is just as easy to breed cattle without horns as with horns, and it is a great deal easier to take care of them afterward.—Farm Press.

Apple Growing.

An authority states that the cause of many failures in apple growing may be found in the bare stems six or eight feet high to the lowest branches. Low headed trees are usually preferable. In a general way, pruning should be done frequently with knife and thumb

Government Is Too Far From The People.

By Rear Admiral FRENCH E. CHADWICK, U. S. N., Retired.

THE difficulty today is that the people have been set aside by circumstances which are too complex to deal with at large, but the chief of which, I think, is the fact that our government, state and national, is not TRULY REPRESENTATIVE. We elect representatives, but through our failure to fix responsibility for legislation anywhere our representatives are secure in office for their full term. Our legislation is formulated in the secrecy of the committee room, and however much the populace may murmur WE MUST TAKE WHAT WE ARE OFFERED.

THE FAILURE TO ADOPT THE ENGLISH PRINCIPLE OF A RESPONSIBLE CABINET IS ACCOUNTABLE FOR MUCH OF OUR FAILURE TO KEEP POWER IN THE HANDS OF THE PEOPLE.

Until we shall have enabled every citizen to have his just weight in every proposition or in electing a representative to speak for him and to bring that representative promptly to account we shall be in the slough of half failure. The thing before us today is to organize a machinery which shall bring the POPULAR WILL into operation.

I should be opposed to the Galveston system of government by commission, whatever its efficiency, on the broad ground that I believe that such methods strike at the root of popular government and that its general application would tend to subvert the whole structure of our government. The instant you stop working TOWARD AN IDEAL you go backward, and our ideal has been the taking part by every citizen in our governmental affairs.

Women form about one-fifth of the municipal electorate in Great Britain. This is simply justice. Every taxpayer, MAN OR WOMAN, resident or nonresident, should have a vote in municipal matters just as they have in other stock corporations. I do not suggest by this plurality voting. I mean that each should have ONE vote. It is right. It is justice. Women taxpayers pay about 40 per cent of our taxes in Newport. They contribute tens of thousands to the city's expense, but they are wholly debarred from saying who shall be on the committee TO EXPEND THIS MONEY. You might with quite as much justice exclude them from voting their stock in the railroad.

I am not in favor of woman suffrage as generally understood. The two questions stand on a wholly different footing. General political suffrage applied to woman would simply double our present difficulties and give to woman a RIGHT which would be pretty much a mere ABSTRACTION.

I, for one, deprecate the excessive, indiscriminate self laudation to which we are so prone. It is ridiculous in the face of the facts.

LET US PRAISE THAT WHICH IS PRAISEWORTHY, AND THERE IS MUCH, BUT DO NOT LET US LOSE SIGHT OF OUR FAULTS.

Some Facts About Our Educational System.

By Dr. W. J. SHEARER, Superintendent of Schools, Elizabeth, N. J.

SCIENTIFIC examination of several thousands of children by skilled specialists and teachers in many cities proves the following:

The number reported upon as dull increases steadily year by year until IN THE HIGHEST GRAMMAR GRADE it is 350 per cent greater than in the first year.

The number reported upon as nervous increases 100 per cent in the same time.

The number reported upon as dull in arithmetic increases 400 per cent in five years.

THE NUMBER REPORTED UPON AS HAVING DEFECTIVE EYESIGHT INCREASES 350 PER CENT IN SEVEN YEARS.

The number reported upon as unruly increases 400 per cent in eight years.

The number reported upon as lazy increases 1,000 per cent in seven years.

Is it any wonder that a late New York report acknowledges that 192,000 pupils are FROM ONE TO SEVEN YEARS BEHIND THE PROPER GRADE, while another authority undertakes to show that seven out of ten pupils enrolled are behind their grade and, therefore, backward pupils?

At the time of promotion from 20 to 50 per cent fail to be promoted, thereby losing six months or a year, though the majority are not more than A FEW WEEKS behind their classmates. There is absolutely no defense for this enormous loss of time. If pupils are one month behind they should lose ONE MONTH, not six months or a year.

NEW YORK CITY HAS BEEN MENTIONED FOR THE REASON THAT THE CONDITIONS ARE TYPICAL OF MOST CITIES, THOUGH NO WORSE.

Coin of the Realm Is Moral.

By Dr. C. W. NEEDHAM, President of George Washington University.

THERE IS NO SUCH THING AS TAINTED MONEY.

What is it that taints money anyway? I know what some people say about it. They say that the wrong conduct of a holder ATTACHES TO THE MONEY and that the money is thereafter unfit for service. Human conduct in acquiring money does not attach to or mix in the coin nor lessen nor weaken the promise to pay upon the bank notes. There is always the question OF OWNERSHIP. The man who gives MUST OWN IT. But there is no such thing as tainted money. Good MORAL MONEY—that is, coin of full weight and live promises to pay—gold coin, is good ANYWHERE in any man's hand.

"TRUTH TAKES NO PASSING SHADOW TO ITSELF," AND MONEY CANNOT BECOME IMPREGNATED BY THE DEEDS OF PASSING USERS.

THE PRESIDENT WILL PRESS THE BUTTON

Cannons Will Boom on Opening Day at Jamestown.

Norfolk, Va., April 16.—With a great naval and military pageant, an address by President Roosevelt and the boom of cannon the Jamestown Exposition will open its doors to the world at noon on April 26.

The ceremonies will be in charge of Gwynn T. Shepherd, secretary of the Exposition, who will be assisted by Lieut. P. H. Bagby, Sixth Infantry, U. S. A., military attache to the department of the secretary.

When the opening day dawns the Norfolk Light Artillery Blues, stationed on the grounds, will fire a salute of 300 guns to the rising sun, ushering in the day that marks the three hundredth anniversary of the first permanent English settlement in America.

President Roosevelt is expected to arrive in Hampton on the Mayflower and he will be given the customary salute by the United States and foreign warships. The President will be landed at the end of the government pier, where he will be met by an escort of troops, who will conduct him to the reviewing stands, on Lee Parade, where at 11.30 o'clock the exercises will begin. These will consist of prayer by Right Rev. Alfred Magill Randolph, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the diocese of Southern Virginia; address and introduction of the President by Hon. Harry St. George Tucker, President of the Exposition; address by President Roosevelt, opening of the Exhibition by the President, who will start the machinery by pressing a button.

As the President presses the button which will give the initial motion to the great fair 1,000 or more flags on the various buildings will be unfurled, the fleet of vessels in Hampton Roads will fire a salute and every band in the vicinity will play "The Star Spangled Banner."

While the bands are playing the troops in the exposition grounds will stand at salute.

The next feature of the day will be a review of the troops ashore and afloat by the President and members of the Diplomatic Corps and guests. The parade will be in charge of Gen. Frederick D. Grant, and will be made up of detachments of sailors and marines from the various war ships from Fort Monroe and those stationed on the grounds.

It is expected than there will be a number of military companies from different States and it is proposed that each governor whose state has troops present will lead his detachment.

For those who have been invited to be the guests of the exposition company there will be a number of special reviewing stands. The President will occupy a stand to himself and with him will be his cabinet, members of the Diplomatic Corps and the officers of the Exposition company. There will also be a governors' stand, where will be the governors who will not participate in the parade. Among the governors who are expected are those of Virginia, Maryland, North Carolina, Delaware, Louisiana, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Florida, Vermont, Alabama, Indiana and Ohio.

During the afternoon, after luncheon President Roosevelt will make an inspection of the grounds and buildings and will be tendered a reception in the auditorium from 5 to 6 o'clock. At this reception the President will meet the guests of the exposition company.

FRIENDSVILLE'S GREAT RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT.

Evangelist Wallace Closes Three Weeks' Campaign—Seventy-four Conversions.

The greatest evangelistic campaign in the history of Friendsville was brought to a successful conclusion on Friday evening, April 12th, under the direction and auspices of Evangelist Virgil W. Wallace of the Church of Christ.

The meeting was of three weeks' duration, during which time seventy-four souls were added to the church.

During the entire meeting the church was crowded to the limit of its capacity and the interest and enthusiasm of the town's people was at its highest tension.

On the closing night the new members were invited to a reception in charge of the congregation, held in Allen's Opera House. This was one of the most enjoyable affairs ever held in the town. The sight of all the new members lined up in semi-circle on the stage of the opera house, where they were given the hand of fellowship by the congregation was one never to be forgotten by those participating, and one well calculated to warm the hearts of even the most pessimistic Christian.

The forceful manner of the evangelist in presenting the simple Gospel plea, together with the excellent music, both vocal and instrumental, under the direction of Misses Iva A. McCullough, of Friendsville, and Adelaide Jaynes, of Fairmont, W. Va., contributed largely to the success of the effort. R.

WRITES TO CHILDREN

Persident Has Special Arbor Day Message.

President Roosevelt has addressed "to the schoolchildren of the United States" a message on the significance of Arbor Day, which during the month of April is celebrated in many of the States. This day was celebrated in Maryland last Friday. He tells the children that they should celebrate the day thoughtfully, and that when they help to preserve our forests or to plant new ones they are acting the part of good citizens. The message is as follows:

"To the Schoolchildren of the United States:

"Arbor Day (which simply means 'tree day') is now observed in every state in every State in our Union, and mainly in the schools. At various times from January to December, but chiefly in the month of April, you give a day or part of a day to special exercises and perhaps to actual tree-planting, in recognition of the importance of trees to us as a nation and of what they yield in adornment, comfort and useful products to the communities in which you live.

"It is well that you should celebrate your Arbor Day thoughfully, for within your lifetime the nation's need of trees will become serious. We of an older generation can get along with what we have, though with growing hardships; but in your full mauhood and womanhood you will want what nature once so bountifully supplies and man so thoughtlessly destroyed, and because of that want you will reproach us, not for what we have used, but for what we wasted, have wasted.

"For the nation, as for the man or woman and the boy or girl, the road to success is the improvement of present opportunity. If you neglect to prepare yourselves now for the duties and responsibilities which will fall upon you later, if you do not learn the things which you will need to know when your schooldays are over, you will suffer the consequence. So any nation which in its youth lives only for the day, reaps without sowing and consumes without husbanding must expect the penalty of the prodigal, whose labor could with difficulty find him the bare means of life.

"A people without children would face a hopeless future; a country without trees is almost as hopeless; forests which are so used that they cannot renew themselves will soon vanish, and with them all their benefits. A true forest is not merely a storehouse full of wood, but, as it were, a factory of wood, and at the same time a reservoir of water. When you help to preserve our forests or to plant new ones you are acting the part of good citizens. The value of forestry deserves, therefore, to be taught in the schools, which aim to make good citizens of you. If your Arbor Day exercises help you to realize what benefits each one of you receives from the forests and how by your assistance these benefits may continue, they will serve a good end.

"THEODORE ROOSEVELT."

More Gas Well Supplies.

FIKE.

The weather of this place at this writing is very inclement, there being about four inches of snow, and the farmers of this section are afraid that the fruit will all be frozen, as the warm weather of March had almost brought the apples and other fruit out in leaves.

Wm. H. Thomas and John H. Thomas made a flying trip to Oakland this week and have returned in safety.

It seems in this section that the dogs are killing a number of sheep. It is reported that Frisbee Humberson, one of our most prominent farmers, killed three dogs in one day. Now it appears that the citizens of this place have got tags for their dogs, but do not put them on the dogs. I suppose the reason is, if the dog wore the tag and would kill any sheep, the tag would tell whose dog had done the killing, and in order that the owner need not pay for them they neglect to put the tag on the dog. I just wish to say that some people think that if they lay the tag away that no one dare kill the dog, but I would like to say to these people that the law reads: "Any dog running at large with out the aforesaid tag can be killed without any damage to the one who killed the dog." I have heard a number of men say that they intend to kill every dog that come on their place that does not wear a tag.

Francis Fike cut his foot a few weeks ago and it required the doctor to take six stitches to close the cut, but at present time he is on the mend.

Jasper Fike, one of the teachers of this county, will soon have his supplies for doing all kind of work in the photographer's line. He would like all to patronize him.

MORE TROUT FOR GARRETT COUNTY

16,000 Brook and 9,000 Rainbow Brought to Oakland for Distribution.

Last Friday afternoon Fish Commissioner Brooke, of the Maryland Fish Commission, brought to Oakland on train No. 55 about 25,000 trout, 16,000 being brook trout, and 9,000 of the rainbow variety.

These fish were distributed to a number of Garrett countians, the majority going to the waters of Election District No. 8, being taken thence by Mr. W. L. Shaffer.

Yesterday morning another large lot of the brook trout were received here, the latter shipment being made from a private hatchery at Maunch Chunk, Pa., and were consigned to parties at Brookside, the Lewis dam and Breedlove, West Va.

By Donald Kennicott.

"It was my father's sword."

As he spoke Knowlton replaced the dented brass scabbard on the elk horns over his fireplace and turned to the grave eyed young girl who stood beside him.

"You see, Miss Marble," he went on, trying to smile away the tinge of bitterness in his voice, "I have no other heritage to cherish."

Where I stood the girl's low voiced reply was inaudible, but a dull flush crept over the young Englishman's clear cut features, and it seemed that he echoed her words, saying a little sullenly, "No; I do not wear it."

The sound of footsteps on the veranda called him to welcome other guests, and I joined Nannie Marble in straying about the rooms, furnished oddly enough for a New Mexican ranch house, yet eloquently descriptive of their owner's life. The battered phonograph with its heap of dusty records, the well worn cloth of the solitaire table and the many shelves laden with innumerable paper novels spoke plainly of the deadly ennui of his present existence. The hunting trophies on the walls, the old cut crystal service on the sideboard, above all the many pictures and photographs, among them his father as general of division and himself as lieutenant of the guards, told that once at least he had lived otherwise, had been something other than a far straying "remittance man."

As we paused before the two portraits I knew that this thought was uppermost in Nannie Marble's mind, for ever since Knowlton's advent in the Blue Water country his love for her had been common knowledge. Yet she surprised me after a moment by saying very quietly, "Do you know why he is here?" and before I could reply answering herself: "He was cashiered for cowardice in the Boer war. Mrs. Loring told me. She showed me a paper that told about it."

There was a deep quiver of grief in her voice, and as she turned away her head for the first time I was certain of what I had for some time suspected—that if she had repulsed him it had been against the dictates of her own heart. It was hard for me to see her in distress, for I had been her father's comrade and had known and loved her since the days when old John Marble's quartz ledge had started the short lived boom at Eldorado City and Nannie, in her little pink pinafore, had ridden about on our shoulders, the undisputed belle of the camp.

"Nannie," I said, "if something else were the reason; if—if cowardice were merely the appearance, could you forgive it?"

Her lip trembled, but she looked up at me bravely enough. "Yes," she said—"yes, if there were anything else in the world; if he had— Oh, it is so hard to believe when one looks at him, and yet the paper told all about it and gave the official order that disgraced him."

I hesitated a moment, still uncertain as to whether it were best to let this girl know the truth about Francis Knowlton. And in that moment my opportunity was gone, for McNanon rallied from the other room, "Come on here; we're off," and we had to join the company assembled for an excursion to the ruins of Eldorado City. It was one of the many jaunts that had been arranged to entertain some visiting school friends of Nannie's and, like most of our entertainments, included the whole neighborhood, for we are too few and too isolated for social subdivisions. All were there—Preach of Promise McNanon, the Nonchalance Man, the Lady of the Absent Husband, the Lunger, the Man Who Invariably Went Armed, I, who— But this is not autobiography.

What with the gayety of our young guests, the cool moonlight and the very good supper that Knowlton's Chinese boy had provided the time passed pleasantly enough, although to me, of course, the ruins of Eldorado City were a familiar and not altogether amusing story. Yet when a coyote appeared in the open doorway of the old Golden Light dance hall and a string of bats came flitting from the entrance of Denny Monahan's tunnel I will confess that the moonlit wreckage took on an uncanny appearance not altogether devoid of interest.

As a climax it had been planned to explore this tunnel, known as Denny Monahan's Lead, from the old Irishman, who had dug steadily into the mountain for three years, hoping to cut some gold, breaking in upon a seemingly limitless limestone cavern and eventually disappearing forever in this pit which he had dug. McNanon led the way in, unreeling as he went the cord which was to guide our return, and with lighted candles the rest of us followed in line. Above us the bats passed out in a continuous stream, and amid tiny shrieks of delight and trepidation from the ladies we proceeded to the limits of the tunnel and out into the natural cavern that had swallowed up the body and, so the delightful tradition ran, the treasure of Denny Monahan. The play of candlelight upon the glittering drops of moisture, the curious formations of onyx and limestone, the infinitely repeated echoes, all called forth their share of admiration, and, although the footing was becoming more difficult, we continued onward, the Lunger taking the lead in order to leave McNanon free to manage his cord.

Fatigue began to manifest itself in the cessation of talk and laughter, and when one of the ladies in the rear of the procession called out some belated jest of the Lunger the boy glanced back in surprise. The next instant he disappeared as if blotted out. I saw McNanon leap back, heard a dull splash, and then Knowlton brushed past me, tearing off his coat as he ran. He, too, plunged out of sight, and we heard sounds of a struggle in water and of some one gasping for breath. Holding my candle over the brink of the pit into which the Lunger had fallen, I could faintly discern the glimmer of water below me, but nothing more. The sound of splashing had ceased also, and for a long time we waited in breathless silence for some reassuring noise from below. Then from out the darkness to the left the even voice of the young Englishman startled us.

"Come a bit this way with that candle, will you?"

A moment later he appeared, scrambling up the sloping rocks at the side, carrying the Lunger like a child in his arms. "I fancy he's knocked his head a bit on the stones down there," he remarked in a level conversational tone as he laid the dripping burden down. Then as Mrs. Loring bent over the unconscious boy he picked up his coat and stepped to one side.

Ten minutes later the Lunger was able to stand and, leaning on Loring's arm, to set out on the return journey. We found that the prolongation of our stay had nearly consumed our candles, and after a consultation the remaining bits were delivered over to the leader and the rest walked in darkness. I was being detailed to close up the rear.

The windings of the passage left me for the most part in total obscurity, and I stumbled along, cursing myself that I had not told Nannie that truth concerning Knowlton which we men had long ago known—that it was his inheritance from a long line of port loving ancestors that had brought him down; that after long monotonous months of garrison duty at an outlying post an urgent appeal for aid from an entrapped scouting party had come at the moment when the demon in his blood had at last got the better of him. A subordinate had led out a relief expedition, and Knowlton had come to live in the valley of the Blue Water. It was not a pretty story, yet a thousand times better than the one which had been told her. And, too, I could add to it that for the past year he had fought against his temptation with an unflinching courage that in my eyes at least had made him almost worthy of her. Yet I had feared that no woman could comprehend what that dull bloom of dust on the cut crystal decanter, an heirloom in the family, he had once remarked to me, with a queer smile, had cost him. I wondered if even now she would understand.

As we turned at last into the straight tunnel I caught sight of two silhouetted figures that walked side by side just in front of me, talking in low tones. And as we approached the entrance they delayed their steps, and there came to me the voice of Nannie Marble, speaking very gently:

"No, no, I do not wish to be told what the real reason was. I have seen. I am sure it was not what that paper said. There is nothing else in the world that I would not trust the man I love to conquer."

Very gravely the man answered her. "Anything in the world now."

And together they passed out into the starlight.

Largest Building Stone.

The walls of the Acropolis at Baalbek are truly called cyclopean. The famous Trilithon, the largest stones ever used in building, measure respectively sixty-five, sixty-four and sixty-three feet in length, each block weighing about 750 tons. How these huge masses were accurately placed in position twenty feet above the ground is a problem which modern science, with all its appliances, leaves yet unresolved. Above them are Arab fortifications. The quarries whence the gigantic materials were obtained are among the most interesting features of Baalbek. Here may still be seen the method of work of the ancient quarrymen, stones vertically hewn lying almost ready to the hand of the builder. One of these stones, to which the Arabs give the name Hajar-el-Houbla, measures sixty-nine feet in length and weighs 915 tons. M. de Sauley calculates it would take the united efforts of 40,000 men to put this huge block in motion. This quarry is now used as a necropolis by the inhabitants of Baalbek.—Sunday at Home.

Recitation,.....Paul Workman.
Recitation,.....Miss Elizabeth Leary.
Solo,.....Mr. Frank E. Rathbun.
Dialogue,.....Harry McComas, Bertie Lawton, Fred Townshend, Ella Cleveland, Mark White and Margaret Hart.

Following the program refreshments consisting of sandwiches, coffee, candy, ice cream and cake were served by the High School girls.

A fitting climax of the occasion was an excellent address delivered by Trustee John W. Hart. It was filled with approbation and inspiration for the teachers of the local school, as well as with high compliments for the recent advances which have been made by the students of the high school during she last few years. He also spoke of how necessary it is for the parents to take a deeper interest in the school work, and to keep in harmony with what is being done by these capable teachers. Short, but encouraging remarks were made by Mr. Harned and Mr. Hinebaugh, who also are trustees of the Oakland school. A hearty response was given to these addresses by Professor Turner, principle of the school.

Married.

WILSON—RUSSELL.—Mr. George W. Wilson, of Wilson, W. Va., and Miss Nancy Louise Russell, of Okonoko, W. Va., were married Wednesday morning at 11.30 o'clock by Rev. George A. Gibbins, of Romney, W. Va. Miss Eleanor Wysong, of Charles Town, W. Va., was maid of honor, and Mr. John S. Mudd, of Baltimore, was best man. The bride entered the parlor with her eldest brother, Mr. Henry Russell, who gave her away. She was gowned in a beautiful costume of French mousseline, and carried a shower boquet of brides roses. Miss Eleanor Wysong, the maid of honor, was gowned in pink silk and carried a boquet of pink and white carnations. Lohengrin wedding march was rendered by Miss Nan Bevans, of Paw Paw, W. Va.

FIKE.

At this writing the weather is much more favorable for farmers in their spring work than at our last writing, although the roads are very muddy.

The Sunday School at this place was reorganized a few weeks ago.

Charles Fike is home on a visit from his work near Elkins, W. Va.

Jasper Fike, one of our farmers, of this place, bought a lot of fencing posts of Wm. R. Fike, of near Fearer, Md.

A tract of land known as the "Sampson Tract," was sold for $1,500 to Mr. Hollinger, of Mill Run. He sold the same tract to Messrs. Amos Umbel, Isaac Savage and F. T. Fike for $1,675.

The farmers just across the line in Fayette county, Pa., and Preston county, W. Va., have been selling a quantity of coal lands to large capitalists. About $100,000 has been paid over.

J. D. Markley and John Hileman have placed a saw mill near here on what is known as the Henry Lee property, and have commenced sawing.

G. W. and M. G. Umbel had a sale in Markleysburg, Pa., on the 16th inst. They will leave for Uniontown, Pa., in the near future, where they will conduct a large mercantile business.

Mr. Wm. H. Thomas bought 23 sheep pelts in one day last week.

Messrs. Joseph Bowser, John R. Fike and G. W. Bowser are cutting timber for two saw mills and in the near future another mill will be added.

Mr. F. T. Fike and a force of workmen are putting up a lime kiln.

Frank Shipley, who resides at Ohio Pyle, Pa., is visiting relatives at this place.

Joseph Thomas has been working for a few days in West Virginia.

Owen Evans and Isaiah Umbel are our most prominent horse dealers.

Bank for Gormania, W. Va.

The first National Bank of Gormania, W. Va., has been organized. Directors as follows were chosen: C. H. Vossler, M. A. Patrick, L. D. Gastiger, E. L. Judy, J. A. Kimble, M. Tambourini, J. H. Schaener, A. F. Swartz, Burt Wilson, Obed A. Hanlin, D. P. Hendrickson, B. Harvey. It remains for the comptroller of currency to pass on the paper, after which a meeting of the directors will be called to complete the organization by selecting a president and other officers. Immediately thereafter the bank will open for business in the Swartz building until a suitable bank building can be constructed. The bank is capitalized at $50,000, one-half to be due and balance in five monthly payments of equal amount. The stock is generally distributed in Henry, Dobbin, Bayard and Gormania, and in the farming sections of Grant county, W. Va., and Garrett county, Md.

BURNING POLITICAL ISSUE IN MARYLAND

Is the Disfranchisement of Many Voters For Over a Century the Question Has Arisen at Different Times.

The burning issue in Maryland for over a century has been the disfranchisement of voters. It is the boast of some of the friends of the late Senator A. P. Gorman that he left the Democratic party in Maryland a live issue—the disfranchisement of voters. That issue is looming up again and is inspiring the leaders and followers of the regular Democratic organization of the city and state to extraordinary efforts to win in Baltimore in May, in order that the way may be paved for a favorable vote in November upon the call for a constitutional convention which must be voted upon at the fall election in conformity with the Constitution, which requires a vote at intervals of 20 years upon the question whether there shall or shall not be a new convention to amend the old Coustitution.

If the convention is called, and if controlled by the Democrats, the Poe amendment, which was defeated two years ago will be incorporated in the Constitution, which will be proclaimed and not submitted to the people for their approval or disapproval.

The Poe amendment, when once a law, will enable the Democrats to seize the reins of government of this city and state and perpetuate that power during the next generation, for all efforts to dislodge them will prove to be fruitless. Recall the Poe amendment. Here it is:

Section 1. All elections by the people shall be by ballot. Every male citizen of the United States, whether native born or naturalized, of the age 21 years or upwards who has resided in this state for one year and in the legislative district of Baltimore city or in the county in which he may offer to vote for six months next preceding the election, and who, moreover, is duly registered as a qualified voter, as provided in this article, shall be entitled to vote in the ward or election district in which he resides at all elections hereafter to be held in this state; and in case any county or city shall be so divided as to form portions of different electoral districts for the election of representatives in Congress, senators, delegates or other officers, then, to entitle a person to vote for such officer, he must have been a resident of that part of the county or city which shall form a part of the electoral district in which he offers to vote for six months next preceding the election; but a person who shall have acquired a residence in such county or city, entitling him to vote at any such election, shall be entitled to vote in the election district from which he removed until he shall have acquired a residence in the part of the county to which he has removed. Every such male citizen of the United States having the above-prescribed qualifications of age and residence shall be entitled to be registered so as to become a qualified voter if he be—

First—A person able to read any section of the constitution of this state submitted to him by the officer of registration and to give a reasonable explanation of the same; or, if unable to read such section, is able to understand and give a reasonale explanation thereof when read to him by the registration officers; or,

Second—A person who, on the first day of January, 1869, or prior thereto, was entitled to a vote under the laws of this state or any other state of the United States wherein he then resided; or,

Third—Any male lineal descendant of such last mentionod person who may be twenty-one (21) years age or over in the year 1906.

No person not thus qualified by coming under some one of the above descriptions shall be entitled to be registered as a qualified voter, nor be entitled to a vote.

The Poe amendment, the burning issue in Maryland, the burning issue in the present campaign in Baltimore, reveals what seems to be a constant purpose in Maryland to disfranchise somebody. Geo. Alfred Townsend best describes the history of disfranchising movements in Maryland:

"If I am familiar with Maryland history," said Mr. Townsend, himself a Marylander, in one of his interesting letters, "the itch is to disfranchise some useful element is as old as the province. The Catholics were put down for 70 years until they were reduced, says McSherry, to one-thirteenth of the population. The Jews were not allowed to be citizens of Maryland until 1836, and every humane legislators who tried to help them to the suffrage was defeated for re-election. Yet the Jews sold out of Baltimore last year $20,000,000 of manufactured clothing, said to be the chief article of that city's wealth.

"The city of Baltimore was disfranchised, or refused its legislative quotum of delegates, till a revolution in 1837 forced a Republican constitution. Next, all foreigners were driven from the polls in Baltimore, and riots, murder and maiming continued till 1860, when the legislature made a police board to turn out Mayor Tom Swann's police. Said the Methodist, Rev. Francis Asbury, in 1776: 'I was fined near Baltimore £5 for preaching the gospel.' The antifederal riots of 1812 killed General Lingan and gored out the eye of the father of Gen. Robert E. Lee so that he died from his injuries. The riots against the soldiery in Baltimore at the opening of the war had a reciprocation in the state Constitution, which caused the very men to wail at the disfranchisement who now have no other issue than to disfranchise.

"The melancholy conclusion of the observed must be that little or no progress has been made in respecting the rights of others, while intolerance to religion has been the custom of all nations, deprivation of citizenship is unusual and contrary to the humane process of all the nations, for the empires and kingdoms are now democratic, while the Democracy of Maryland is despotic and re-enact the Dred Scott decision for the twentieth century—that black men have no rights which white men are bound to respect. They say Taney did not say that, but they do now say it, and take away from the electors of 235,000 colored people in Maryland their only right which identifies them with representation. For what? Has there been an insurrection? Cannot the negro learn to read? The census shows that negro illiterates in this state are only six or four illiterate whites. The entire number of Maryland illiterates is 133,000 less than all the blacks in the state. So there must be 172,000 educated colored people in Maryland.

"What is the motive for such a late move in our state history?

"To keep the offices. Maryland had become a debatable state, and, and no issue was left but race prejudice. The corruptions of the Democratic party in Baltimore had driven Gorman from the Senate and Rasin and others from the spoils. A Republican governor and legislature and two Republican senators, two or more Republican mayors of Baltimore, a Republican congressional delegation sometimes, alarmed the coterie with the fear the great North would settle Maryland by the growth of Washington city, would assimilate Baltimore, also, to modern thoughts and enlightened mutuality of kindness. The late slave must be deposed from his 40 years of the enjoyment of the ballot, a meditated crime, the greatest of all the crimes of the party which for years crammed the ballot-boxes and miscounted the votes. History must be searched far back for such a persecution.

"I can think of two—the Jews in Spain and the Protestants in Poland. The Jews had been tolerated by the Arian Goths till they turned Orthodox and took away all the reasonable rights of the Jews. The Jews opened the gates of Toledo to the Moors, who conquered Spain for 800 years. There is no Spaniard who does not feel the disgrace of that era. To deprive the Dissidents Polands of their rights, the dissatisfaction was sown which ended the independence and glory of the Polish kingdom.

"But I can come to Maryland, also, with an example. In 1814 the fear of a negro insurrection in the old slave peninsular, at which is aimed the present disfranchisement, so paralyzed the militia of Maryland that they would not fight and ran away from hardly two regiments of British soldiers and sailors. Yet the negroes of Baltimore helped to defend it a very little later and were found in the ranks. We have negro regiments in the United States Army, and I have heard that our most invincible cavalry regiment is a colored one. The man defending his country, and facing pestilence in the South, for he is happily an immune, can come to Pennsylvania or Ohio and be an American, but not Maryland, where he will be legally dead. Thus we are setting Maryland to the front as a foe of service and labor, and already we are scarce of laborers, who are drawn away to Pittsburg and West Virginia, with no immigration to make up the deficit. Baltimore is now scouring Canada for laborers and discouraging that colored labor which the late Judge Frederick Stone, of the Court of Appeals, told me was the best peasantry in the world."

BITTINGER.

This week begins with clear skies and bright sunshine and the people are all glad that the bitter storms and cold piercing winds of last week have passed away, and in their stead they feel a touch of glad springtime in the now prevailing milder breezes.

There has been a revival in the sugar industry here and there is a promise of a considerable quantity of "sweets" being made in this territory this week.

Mr. William Zinkin, of Accident, and Miss Sarah Bitzell, of near this place, were joined in the holy bonds of matrimony on last Sunday afternoon. We were unable to get further particulars.

Dr. Robinson, of Grantsville, was here last Saturday on professional business.

Daniel Orendorf and Mahlon Bittinger of Mountain Lake Park, were seen in this village last Sunday.

The ladies of the Lutheran congregation at this place finished repairing the interior of the church on last Saturday afternoon and on the following morning Rev. J. B. Shoup conducted the regular Sunday morning service in the building. The good ladies are to be commended for their untiring efforts in accomplishing these much needed repairs.

Mrs. Samuel J. Brenneman, who has been ailing for some time, is reported as improving at the time of this writing.

C. J. Hanft, of Keyser, Md., spent last Sunday and Monday with friends and relatives here.

John L. Beachy lost a valuable horse last week, the animal having contracted a virulent case of distemper which would not respond to treatment.

Mahlon Brenneman, of McHenry, spent last Sunday with his parents at this place.

The Normal school at this place is steadily growing in interest and the enrollment is steadily increasing. The number today (Monday) is twenty-four, twenty of whom are taking the regular teachers' grade.

Patriotic Ancestry.

Miss Harriet Brian, at present a resident of Rowlesburg, W. Va, formerly of this city, is the unmarried daughter of Nathanial Brian, of Cumberland, who was a soldier in the war of 1812. She is also the granddaughter of James Bryan, a soldier in the Revolutionary war. Still more, she is a niece of Alpheus B. Beall, soldier in the Second War of Independence.

Allegany county, up to three years ago, had two living sisters, daughters of George King, a revolutionory soldier, who died in 1845 in Garrett county. These two sisters were Emorella and Ruth. The latter was never married and died three years ago. Emorella was twice married and left children. She died about a year ago in Uniontown, Pa., at a great age. J. B.

SMALL BOY HAD NARROW ESCAPE.

Foot Badly Injured by Wheels of Freight Car Last Thursday.

"Cal" Menhorn, aged twelve years, a son of Mr. and Mrs. John Menhorn, of Oakland, while in company with another lad of about the same age, was severely injured on last Thursday afternoon at a point on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad near Altamont by a freight train.

The two boys have for some time past been making a habit of jumping upon and riding trains passing through Oakland, going as far east as Altamont and westward to Terra Alta. On Thursday the boys went to Altamont and in attempting to catch a train homeward bound young Menhorn missed his footing, his left foot being caught between the rail and one of the wheels of the car which he attempted to get on, resulting in crushing the side of his foot horribly.

From the place where the accident occurred the boys walked to Deer Park, young Menhorn having bandaged his foot as well as he could with a handkerchief and finding an old shoe alongside the roadway he slipped it on. At the Deer Park station the boys were found by a traveling man who inquired what had happened and being informed he secured the services of a Deer Park physician, who stopped the flow of blood and sent the youngsters home on the accommodation train.

Dr. McComas dressed the boy's foot upon his arrival here and anticipates no serious consequences.

U. S. COURT IN CUMBERLAND

Judge Morris To Open It In May Mr. Feaga The Clerk.

The office of the Clerk of the United States District Court will be open in Cumberland permanently and Deputy Clerk William J. Feaga will be on hand every day. It was the impression that the office would be open only during the sittings of the court, but this is a mistake. All persons having business with the United States District Court residing in Garrett, Allegany and the western end of Washington county may transact it in Cumberland instead of going to Baltimore. There will be two sessions a year—the second Monday in May and the last Monday in September. Judge Morris will come from Baltimore next month aud inaugurate court. Assistant United States District Attorney Maurice A. Soper, Mr. Arthur L. Spamer, court clerk, and United States Marshal John F. Langhammer will be present. Mr. Feaga, the deputy clerk, was a member of the General Assembly of Maryland in 1904.

Joseph Faithful In Prison.

"The iron crown of suffering preceded the golden crown of glory."—F. B. Meyer.

The fascination in this four-thousand-year-old story is that it is a study in Life. It is not a middle age piece of scholasticism, but a warm-blooded history of human nature; not dissertation on metaphysical generalities, but a tale of human emotions, as they are felt to-day, and every day, and everywhere. It is the "proper study of mankind." It concerns Man, and is consequently universally interesting. . . . The effort to retell the story is futile. To reclothe it is to do violence to it. Its own dress is its only dress. Its simplicity, genuineness, fidelity, make it a masterpiece of literature. . . . As in a microcosm, one sees here the evolution of a man and a statesman. The circumstances which seem to retard really accelerate the process. . . . Joseph had learned how to "take honey out of the eater"—one of the finest and most useful arts of life. As a slave, he made himself indispensable to his master. Two thousand years before St. Paul, he lived the apostle's maxim. He served not as a "man-pleaser, but as unto the Lord." A quaint version describes him as a "luckie felowe." But even his heathen master could discern the Divine accompaniment to his human thrift and industry, and acknowledged that the Lord made all he did to prosper in his hand." . . . Yet all the while there was the poignant sense of humiliation. The heir of a prince must needs wear the band of slave. His hard lot, however, could not make a pessimist or misanthrope of him. His engaging qualities were uneclipsed. Unconsciously, he was schooling for the premiership. Faithful in few things, he was to be lord of many. His very attachment to Potiphar, chief captain of the royal guard, and keeper of the royal prison, made him conversant with affairs and men and methods of state, invaluable to him in his after career. . . . The next incident seemed to plunge Joseph in irretrievable ruin. An Oriental prison is a descent to hell, which may well be inscribed, "Leave all hope behind who enter here." . . . The account is perfertly faithful to Oriental judicial processes, in that it makes no allusion to a trial. There was none. Accusation was sufficient. Nor is there any reference to the term for which Joseph was committed. It was indefinite. It was the pleasure of Potiphar. Had the latter passed from the scene, a new commander of its prison would have found no record in Joseph's case, and he might have languished for a lifetime. . . . Yet, even in prison, Joseph was still the "luckie man" the Bishops' Bible calls him. For, in the shortest space of time, the prisoner was the prison-keeper; and it prospered. . . . All things kept working together for good to Joseph—his brothers' malignant jealousy; his transformation into a slave, his exile from his native land; the foul and false accusation; his imprisonment—as man seeth, each was a step in the decensus inferno; as God seeth, and as man saw afterward, each was a step in a staircase leading to a throne and a coronation; a new verification of an old saying, "Through tribulation deep the way to glory is." . . . Yet all turned on the character of Joseph. A meretricious and evanescent promotion have come to him even had he been insincere and corrupt at heart. But a permanent exaltation in the hearts of his own and his adopted countryman; an assured position among the immortal worthies in the kingdom and patience of God—a good life only can win that distinction.

Analysis and Key.

1. A study of life.
   The charm and value of an old story.
2. Evolution of a man and a statesman.
   What apparently retards really accelerates.
   The art of taking honey out of the eater.
   Joseph knew and practiced it.
   Unconscious schooling for premiership.
3. Joseph's apparent irretrivable ruin.
   Accusation. Imprisonment.
4. Joseph's "luck" out come of character
5. Permanent exaltation only won by a good life.

The Teacher's Lantern.

It was the contention of the late John Fisk that evil must needs be present; that morality comes upon the scene when there is an alternative offered of living better lives or worse lives: that the action of the ideal man is to be determined not by the pursuit of pleasure and the avoidance of pain, but by the pursuit of goodness and the avoidance of evil.

* * * * *

But Joseph, four thousand years ago, splendidly realized Mr. Fisk's ideal. In Egypt, the home of unchastity (martial), where marriage infidelity was prevalent (Herodotus), under the most seductive and persistant solicitation, he kept himself pure. Joseph shines brilliantly as an ancient example of chastity. The example is inspirational for young men of today.

* * * * *

John Ruskin makes a fine discrimination, and a helpful one, in this connection, when he says, deprecating his own "bringing up," that he was innocent "by protection rather than virtuous by choice." "Innocent by protection" is a feeble thing, apt to be surprised and taken by guile; and protection, at best, can only be approximate.

* * * * *

"Virtue by choice," like that of Joseph, is the ever-accumulating virile force that makes for right living. The deliberate, intelligent, free, continuous preference of the good, the true, the beautiful, is the charm and wisdom of saintliness. The very constitution of the world, natural and social, is designed to afford opportunities for such preferences.

* * * * *

Mr. Fisk affirms that though, in the process of spiritual evolution, evil must needs be present, the nature of evolution also requires that it shall be evanescent. "From the general analogies furnished in the process of evolution, we are entitled to hope that, as it approaches its goal, and man comes nearer to God, the fact of evil will lapse into a mere memory, in which the shadowed past shall serve as a background for the realized glory of the present."

* * * * *

Joseph's clothes kept getting him into trouble, though he was in no way responsible. First, it was his coat of many colors, with which his father had invested him, perhaps, in token that he was to have the rights of primogeniture. Sight of it enraged his brothers. Now, it was the cloak he left in the clutches of an adulterous woman, and which her illicit love turned to deadly hate, she could use as evidence against him. People's clothes are still getting them into trouble, and with more reason.

* * * * *

"Remember me when it shall be well with thee." That smacks of worldly wisdom. But it may be in appearance only. To avail one's self of legitimate human means does not necessarily signify at all that one has abandoned his trust in God. However, the butler forgot.

* * * * *

Enslaved at seventeen; a slave ten years; a prisoner three years; prime minister at thirty—that is Joseph's history in a nutshell. The scene of it, probably Heliopolis near the modern Cairo.

* * * * *

Joseph's victory shows how a man, especially a young man, is to overcome temptation, The first requirement is, Walk as in the all-seeing presence of God; the second, Fight with the weapons of the Word, in the light of duty; the third, Avoid the occasions of sin; the fourth, Firmness above all things; and, if it must be, flight, with loss of the good name, and even of life itself. (Lange.) Such flight is more honorable than the most heroic deed. (Calwer.) The fear of God is the best means of grace for avoiding sin and shame. (Lange.) In a temptation to adultery or fornication, flight becomes the most pressing necessity. (Ibid.) Joseph lets his mantle go, but holds on to a good conscience. (Krummachee.)

* * * * *

The paradoxes of Joseph: A slave yet a freeman; unfortunate, yet the child of fortune; forlorn, yet still in the presence of God; object of impending wrath, yet preserved alive; a prisoner, yet a prison-keeper, every way subdued, yet superior to his condition; his misfortune his fortune; his fortune his misfortune.

COBBLER'S FUEL SCHEME IS OUT

Chemists Discover Ellmore's Secert That Burns Ashes.

The remarkable ash-burning secret discovered by John Ellmore, an Altoona, Pa., cobbler, which has excited attention almost the world over, is out. Almost every householder in Altoona is now converting his ashes into fuel, with great saving in coal bills.

Several well known chemists, immediately it was announced that Ellmore had solved the problem of obtaining heat from ashes, set to work to try to discover the formula. They were successful, and here it is:

Common salt, one pound.
Oxalic acid, two ounces.
Water, one gallon.

Mix and moisten a mixture containing one part coal and three parts ashes, and a better fuel than pure coal is obtained.

The ashes of anthracite coal burn as readily as do those of bituminous coal. This mixture will, upon being placed upon a burning fire, fuse into a coke-like mass and deposit but little residue.

The chemical action of this compound is thus explained: When an aqueous solution of an alkaline salt, such as common salt, is mixed with coal ashes, the result is that a mild lyre is formed, which, when mixed with any combustible material, such as coal, and upon the application of heat gives off oxygen gas, thus enabling rapid combustion.

The addition of oxalic acid causes a chemical change of greater value than the first, for the reason that the second chemical breakdown results in the formation of a carbide, which in turn gives off acetyline gas, thus adding to the intensity of the heat and facilitating complete combustion.

It is possible upon moistening a small quantity of ashes, without the addition of coal, to readily detect the odor of acetyline gas, and if the treated ashes are placed upon a lighted fire they will fuse and burn to a fine powder.

The ash-burning compound is now being use in many large industrial and mercantile places and it is clalmed for it that it has reduced the fuel item to more than half. It has eliminated almost entirely the question of disposing of ashes, which has been considerable where great quantities of coal are consumed.

The discovery has resulted in a number of complications and is retarding the work of paving contractors who have utilized ashes as a foundation for sidewalks. Heretofore it was possible so secure all the ashes required for this purposes without cost but contractors are now complaining that it is impossible to get them.

Ellmore who discovered the secret and focused attention upon the possibilities that lurked in ashes, claims that his patent will protect him in his secret. He claims to have received an offer from the British government if he can demonstrate the practicabilty of his compound.

While it is everywhere conceded that Ellmore has conferred a great boon upon humanity it is feared that he will not derive any tangible benefits from his discovery, in view of the fact that hundreds of others have secured the same results, following his lead.

GOOD ROADS ADVICE.

Minnesota Highway Commissioner Gives Some Pertinent Points.

George W. Cooley, secretary and engineer of the Minnesota highway commission, has issued the commission's bulletin No. 1. It deals in detail in instructions as to the proper method of building substantial roads in various kinds of soil at the least expense, says the Motor News. Mr. Cooley gives the following rules for the guidance of road overseers throughout the state:

Keep all lines of drainage open. Keep ruts and hollows out of the road by continuous filling and dragging. Keep stones, sod and all vegetable matter off the road surfaces. Fill all low places and holes with the same material of which the road is built.

See the culverts are in condition to take care of the flowing water, especially before freezing up time, and open them up as early in the spring as possible. Don't change your men and teams around too much. They will give more satisfaction if kept at the same class of work.

Keep weeds and brush away from the sides of the road as much as possible, and wherever the road is too much shaded, especially if it is clay, trim the trees up to a height of eight feet above the ground.

Never disturb a government corner or boundary monument without seeing that it is re-established by some competent surveyor and with the knowledge of the adjacent proprietors. It is their property, even though it is in a public highway, and you will be liable for damages if you disturb it without giving due notice.

All the material within the limits of the right of way may be used for road purpose only. You have no right to the grass or timber or to the earth or stone not required for the road. All such belong to the abutting owner to the center of the road, but in his use or taking of them he is limited by the right of the authorities to make whatever use of them that is necessary for the improvements and protection of the public travel.

DOWN PANAMA WAY.

By Louise J. Strong.

Copyright, 1907, by P. C. Eastment.

Retta in the rose arbor was reaching for a bud above her head when her cousins, Charlie and Alf, came out the side door and stood drawing on their gloves.

"Don't get reckless, old man," Charlie counseled as if continuing a conversation. "Retta means all right. She's a little flighty; that's all."

"That's what I used to think," Alf returned gloomily, "but I'm convinced now that she really shrinks from a marriage with me. I suppose she doesn't love me as she thought she did when we became engaged."

Charlie shook his head. "Oh, no, Alf, you're mistaken. She's wrapped up in you."

"Looks like it." Alf laughed sarcastically. "This is the third time she's backed out, declaring she was not ready when the day loomed close. I haven't wanted to hurry her. I know a girl gives up a good deal when she marries. But a fellow with nobody and never a home to remember naturally thinks considerably of having a home of his own, especially with a little wife that's just"— He broke off for an instant, then went on: "I'm able to provide for her in the style she is accustomed to or I would not have asked her to marry me. And if we are ever to be married there's no use in waiting longer. If she's found that she cares for some"—

"I AM GLAD TO MEET YOU."

"None of that, Alf!" Charlie interrupted. "Retta flirts a little, but that's all. Have you told her how seriously you regard the postponement?"

"No, and I'm not going to either," Alf declared sulkily.

"Some one should. She"—

"Some one shouldn't and shan't!" Alf said fiercely. "No girl is going to be coerced into marrying me. I suppose if I howled around and raised a great racket she would give in, but we'll never be married until she's perfectly willing without outside pressure. I'll get out of the way for awhile and let her have a chance to find herself; won't even write to her. I've influenced her too much, maybe."

Charlie still shook his head, but offered no further remonstrance, merely asking, "In what direction are you going to perambulate and when?"

"Oh, down Panama way and as soon as I can fix my business to leave it, and that won't take many days."

Charlie whistled. "Not going in for an engineering job in that sickly hole, I hope."

"I may find a job when I get there, but I'm going foot loose. I've always been interested in the big ditch scheme. It'll be a diversion to examine it at close range."

"And Retta"— Charlie began.

"I'll tell Retta and leave her free to find herself, as I said. And I don't want any one to interfere—to say one word to influence"—

They passed around the corner of the house on the way to the gate, and Retta sank limply upon a bench. She had been too startled to move at first and then perceived the impossibility of revealing her presence. It was eavesdropping, but she was not thinking of that or of the errand to Aunt Anna that had brought her across lots through the rose arbor. The "finding" of herself had come with a suddenness that shook her breathless as she listened. She had not realized before how much her happiness depended upon Alf and Alf's faithful love or how very dearly she loved him.

"Poor fellow!" she sighed tenderly, wiping her eyes. "Poor fellow—how selfish I've been when I knew he never had a home and how he is looking forward to one of his own! He's such a home body, and I've been cheating him—keeping him in lodgings when he hates it so—and—and when I want—yes, I do—only I'm such a flyaway! I do want to make the dear boy a home. And he's going off to—to— Where is Panama way? A sickly hole, Charlie called it. Oh, he mustn't! He mustn't!"

She fled home, into the library, and began a search for information concerning Panama way, a search that was somewhat hindered by her linking the two words. But by the aid of the encyclopedia, the physical geography and magazine articles she soon acquired more knowledge of the country than her erstwhile boarding school teacher would have deemed possible, for Retta's strong point was not learning. She was just a sweet little girl, womanly and tender, with a careless shrinking from responsibility, engendered by her entire freedom from such. But now her heart was aroused, and she was aghast with horror at the idea of Alf, her own Alf, going down Panama way to endure all sorts of torments and dangers and finally die of the dreadful fevers! He should not! He should not! She would prevent it somehow, and it must be done at once, for he would be making arrangements to leave his business, even this minute, perhaps!

She rushed away to consult her mother, but that good lady, being deeply engrossed in some charitable function, was out indefinitely, and Retta, feeling no time could be wasted, determined to act for herself. Perhaps if she had had the advice of an older head she would have been less precipitate and irrevocable in her actions.

"I'm mowing a clean swath, burning my ships behind me," she commented confusedly, in the middle of a tempestuously busy afternoon in which she did some very unconventional things.

"I suppose it does look curious to them; I suppose the bride to be's mother is usually to the fore and the b. to b. hangs back in blushing confusion, but I can't wait on mamma when Alf's getting ready this very minute for Panama way. I've got to fix it so there's no getting out of it and leave me a rag of—and I don't care much if they do stare—and I guess I'm sure of dear old Alf!"

Yet she was a bit anxious as she waited in a convenient spot for waylaying him as he left his office. If—if Alf were bent and determined on Panama way, she would be in a pretty predicament! She whipped around the corner, apparently oblivious of him until she almost collided with him. Then her heart sank at his grave and formal apology. He had been more deeply hurt and offended than he had shown the evening before when she had insisted on a further postponement, but she must—she caught her breath as he said coldly:

"I am glad to meet you. It will save my coming up this evening to tell you"—

"And I'm glad to meet you," she broke in, laughing nervously. "I want to tell you that I've—I've changed my mind, Alf."

"Changed your mind?" he repeated blankly.

"Yes, about—about"—it was harder than she had imagined with his cold, unresponsive eyes upon her; what if he should—she quaked, but plunged on—"about our wedding—and we won't postpone it, after all."

He flushed angrily as he replied. "You were not asked to change your mind—nor the arrangements you made last evening."

"You mean that you don't want to—that you won't now," she cried, with wide eyes.

"I mean that you are not to be compelled, influenced. When did you see Charlie?" And between his teeth he muttered savagely, "Just wait till I see him!"

"I haven't seen Charlie to speak to since yesterday morning!" she declared and burst into a bewildering torrent of explanation and tears. "Oh, if you won't, Alf; if you've changed your mind and don't want me now, when I've found out how much I want you—if you won't—I'll have to run away! For, oh, Alf, I went alone and bought the dress—and took it to madame's and was measured—and I've ordered all the invitations—and engaged the caterer—and the flowers, all—just as we planned—because I wanted to show you how much I care." Sobs that she struggled to repress choked her.

"And you haven't seen Charlie—no one has influenced you?" he demanded incredulously.

"No one has said a word to me about it! I—I found out how much I really cared, and I couldn't get ready fast enough, though mamma was away, and I had to do it alone," she panted impetuously.

He melted entirely. "You dear little whirlwind! You have smashed the proprieties!" he breathed softly and proudly. "I wish"—he glanced about furtively; no, it was too public! "Anyway we can have an hour at the store selecting our furniture."

And, tucking her hand under his arm, they wandered away down the "primrose path," the journey down Panama way entirely and forever forgotten.

Strength In Vegetable Growth.

"Strength is not a thing usually attributed to maidenhair fern," remarked a local florist, "and yet if its roots have not sufficient room they will break the strongest flowerpots. Blades of grass will force the curbstones between which they spring out of place. Indeed, the strength of vegetable growth is wonderful. The most striking example is the island of Aldabra, to the northwest of Madagascar. The island is becoming smaller and smaller through the action of the mangroves growing at the foot of the cliffs. The roots break off immense pieces of stone, which fall into the sea. Into the gaps thus formed the waves eat their way. In a few years it is likely that by the combined action of the waters and mangroves the island will disappear."—Philadelphia Record.

JUVENILE GRANGE WORK.

How One Organization of Young People Is Conducted With Success.

[Special Correspondence.]

As the organizing of juvenile granges is becoming more and more popular, a few hints on different ways of making their meetings successful and profitable may be of interest. As so much depends upon the matron, one should be chosen with reference to her fitness for the place. She should be able to govern in a kind, inconspicuous way, but never in such a manner as will antagonize the children, for no good work can be done unless the matron is entirely in sympathy with them and shows a lively interest in all of their plans.

As soon as the officers and members once learn to conduct the meetings they should be allowed to do so and to attend to all business pertaining to the Order without any interference from the matron, so long as it is properly done. Correct business methods and parliamentary rules should be taught from the outset.

That the meetings may not become monotonous pleasant seasonable amusements are planned. Last summer our juveniles enjoyed a picnic and this winter a sleigh ride party. All necessary expenses were paid from the juvenile treasury.

Nature study lessons are profitable to introduce into the lecturers' programme, and the children enjoy them if their interest is aroused by having them collect specimens, dissect and examine buds, fruits, roots, etc. Bulletins on this subject can be obtained by applying to J. W. Spencer, College of Agriculture, Cornell university. Last year the boys each had a garden and reported their successes and failures from time to time in the meetings, while the girls tried their skill at raising sweet peas. This year I plan to have the boys compete for a prize which I will give to the one raising the largest pumpkin. I will furnish the seed that it may be uniform, and they will be instructed in some simple methods that will increase their chances for success, such as liberally fertilizing the soil, allowing but one plant in each hill and removing all the sets except the one most promising. The girls will raise zinnias, as they are hardy and easily grown. This seed will also be furnished and a prize be given for the best bouquet cut from these flowers.

At one meeting each member was asked to write a verse about his or her right hand neighbor as they were seated in the grange and bring it to the next meeting. Every child responded, and such originality and humor as all showed! At another time each girl brought some homemade candy and showed her ability in that line of the culinary art.

The little miss who holds our lecturer's chair is one of our bri...est members and will arrange a very nice programme entirely unaided. "My Favorite Pets" and "My Favorite Study" are subjects which she has had discussed, while there are always recitations, selections, music, question box, conundrums or quotations to vary the programme. The juveniles are often asked to contribute something to the programme of the subordinate grange and always willingly respond. This work is all the while bringing the children into closer touch with the elevating influence of the grange and preparing them for the duties of maturer years.

EDUCATIONAL INTERESTS.

Some Recommendations to the Maine State Grange.

Indicative of the interest which the grange takes on education everywhere may be cited the following from the report of the committee on education of the Maine state grange:

We indorse the suggestions that subordinate granges so arrange their programmes that they may discuss the following questions:

First.—The necessary physical surroundings for a school.

Second.—The changes needed in our courses of study, both in the common schools and in the high schools.

Third.—Why should boys and girls take the high school and university courses?

Fourth.—The financial value of education.

Fifth.—The study of nature in the grange, the home and the school.

Sixth.—What does the grange owe the schools?

Seventh.—The ideal citizen.

We would also add to these the suggestion that each lecturer of a subordinate grange secure one or more copies of the Maine school laws and arrange to discuss one or more sections of them at each literary meeting.

This is taking the question of the right education of our young people into systematic and careful consideration, and the outcome of such discussion in the various granges of the state will be fraught with good.

Debating Teams to Contest.

The Springfield (Mass.) Pomona has undertaken to organize a series of debates between teams, representing various subordinate granges. The plan is for each local organization to elect or otherwise designate a debating team of three members. The different teams from the several granges in the Pomona circuit will be paired off, and the winners of one set will debate the winners of a second set. When the contest is narrowed down until two undefeated teams remain, these teams will go before the Springfield Pomona grange and debate for honors.

NO END TO WAR WHILE MAN IS MAN.

An International Peace Congress, with Mr. Andrew Carnegie as its president, has been in session in New York City this week, its purpose being to promote disarmament and universal peace among the nations of the earth. Unity of sentiment, however, was not apparent in its deliberations, some of the delegates expressing doubts of the propriety of disarmament and others alluding to wars in the past which were considered righteous and resulted in humanity. Many of the delegates, however, assumed the position that there can be no excuse for war. Mr. Carnegie appears to take this advanced stand on the subject. It may be conceded that there is room for difference of opinion in relating to the question. It seems illogical to contend that disciples of the Prince of Peace should, under any circumstances, advocate violent dealing with their fellow-men. Yet an occasion in His mission to the world when He exercised violence toward those who were profaning the Temple, and He scourged them with a whip of cords, driving them from the sanctuary. This may not fairly be used as an argument in favor of war and certainly it should be the purpose and effort of Christain nations to avoid, as far as possible, conflicts of arms. But it does seem to teach that force may become necessary to prevent wrongdoing by individuals, and if so, why not consistent with its use compel nations to act justly? Individuals by wrongdoing incur penalties which are righteously inflicted. Nations are only aggregations of individuals and occasions arise when they justly deserve and should receive punishment.

Further, it is doubtful whether disarmament would prevent war. The non existence of weapons and munitions of war for the time being could not prevent their speedy creation if occasion should arise for their use, and the nation most skilled and proficient in manufactures would, in the event of a misunderstanding, possess a great advantage over its enemy. Perhaps, after all, being thoroughly prepared for war may be one of the most effective means of avoiding it.

It may even be doubted whether if all nations were devoted solely to the arts of peace, there would not be deterioration in manliness and of that genuine courage which sometimes, at least, causes man as an individual to suffer wrongfully rather than to resort to mere brute strength for vindication.

But this is only speculation. There is a view of the case, however which must force itself upon the consciousness of every thoughful individual. Man is an imperfect being and may descend to depths of evil and, if not under restraint from a power stronger than himself resort to acts of violence, rapine and murder so horrible as to shock the least sense of right in another. Examples of this are not wanting at this day in the atrocities perpetrated recently in Russia and Bulgaria. What protection could be given, in such cases, to innocent sufferers if military power could not be invoked to stay the tiger-ish propensities of a mob.

Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix, rector of Trinity parish, New York, in a sermon at the memorial service of the Loyal Legion of the United States, put this point forcibly by saying: "If international war should cease that happy occurrence would not bring war to an end; it would still have to be waged, not by nation against nation, but within each nation, between forces protective of law and order and other forces destructive to the peace and quiet of the state."

"The law," he declared, "is menaced by classes impatient of authority and restless under restraint. Modern society is in ferment today. This city contains, one dreads to think of how large a number, who are deluded by visions never to be realized and seething with passions which no calm voice or sound speech can allay. Dismiss the police, disband the National Guard and secure noninterference by the general Government and what would happen?"

It may fairly, from all this, be concluded that wars will not end while man is man. They may be reduced to a minimum by arbitration, however, a much more practical method than disarmament and one to be strongly commended. Even this the Peace Congress recognized and agreed to.

WILL PROBABLY BE COL. BRYAN.

It is extremely probable that Col. Wm. Jennings Bryan will be the next Democratic candidate for the Presidency. The Democrats in the Legislature of Tennessee have unanimously adopted a resolution that he is the logical choice of the party. The Southern and Western Democrats seem to be with him and it is said the New York Tammany Democrats favor his nomination, which means the votes of the delegates from New York City. These are significant circumstances. But stronger indications of his strength, even with Eastern Democrats, are to be found in his presence as the guest of honor on Founder's day at the University of Virginia, and at the observance of the anniversary of the birth of Jefferson by the Brooklyn, N. Y., Democratic Club. He was "given a magnificent reception and delivered a characteristic discourse," according to the reports of the latter function. Edward M. Shepherd, of New York, one of the speakers on the occasion, declared in the name of the club the hope that the Nebraskan will be the leader of the party in 1908 as its candidate for the Presidency.

As Col. Bryan is as ever in his advocacy of the government ownership of railroads and other heresies it may be set down as certain, however, that he will not be an acceptable candidate to Democrats of the Grover Cleveland type.

WATTERSON BETS ON HUGHES.

The able and ever interesting Henry Watterson has just returned from a trip to Europe. In an interview yesterday in New York city he named Governor Hughes as next President; relegated President Roosevelt to the background unless he chooses to run again in 1912, and gave Bryan the next Democratic nomination without opposition.

"I predicted last June," he said, "that Hughes would succeed Roosevelt in the White House. At that time Horace White, Mr. Hughes and I were at Brown University and I told Hughes that while some Republicans might not like him, they would have to select him. I believe Hughes will be to the Republican party what Tilden was to the Democratic. I have in my pocket a ticket in the Paris mutuals calling for 100 to 1 that Hughes will be the next president of the United States."

Of President Roosevelt Watterson said:

"He wouldn't dare accept the nomination. I thought some time ago he was coming around to the proposition, but I haven't thought so since last winter. The president then told a group of newspaper men that if the Republican convention in 1908 should force the nomination upon him he would decline and they would have to hold a second convention. We can't Mexicanize this country. Two terms in the White House for one man is about all the people will stand."

The colonel then swung around to William J. Bryan, saying:

"Mr. Bryan has driven some few hundred out of the party already. It seems to me that he has driven the party out of control in every northern State too, and out of control of congress. He's a pretty good driver, is Bryan. The condition or chaos in the Democratic ranks may result in the formation of a new party based on the Socialistic theories now being put forward, cannot see how the party can get together, divided as it is into three or four groups, forever kicking the stuffing out of one another. I can't see how the Democrats stand a mortal chance in 1908."

Help! Help! Help!

Nothing very serious the matter—don't get excited—but your HELP is needed.

Every man, every woman and every child can HELP. This town needs your HELP.

It is a good town, but every good citizen wants to see it become a better town. But unless the good citizens stand by the town, lend a hand, put a shoulder to the wheel or get in front and pull, without balking, there won't be any noticeable progress.

Towns are not Topsies. No town "just grows." It's the people in a town and around it who make it grow by feeding it the right sort of diet.

A pig in a poke won't get fat. Nor will a town with its light hidden under a bushel attract attention from outside.

Unless you throw corn into a lean shoat the animal never will become a fat porker. It is just as necessary to feed a town and community with fresh material from the outside world.

It is up to you and each of us to get out and forage for the town. Speak a good word for it. Write a good letter for it. To you the place where you live is the most important place in the world. It is the best place in the world. It is the center of the world. The universe revolves around it.

This being so—and you can't deny it—why not HELP advertise the center of the universe? Why not tell your friends and acquaintances elsewhere what they are missing by living away from the real center?

Talk has built up many a town—every town, in fact. Talk can build up this town. You can't talk too much if you talk right.

P. S.—HELP! HELP! HELP!

THE MILLS OF THE GODLESS

A Sensible Editorial on the Thaw and White Affair.

New York City, and to a considerable extent the whole world, has been deeply interested by the trial of one Harry K. Thaw, for the killing of one Stanford White. Both of these men were famous and infamous.

The man killed was a noted architect and his work was praised all over the world. Any stranger that entered New York, the city toward which all people gravitate, could not help seeing some of the effects of this man's genius. He was known as a good business man, just and even generous in his dealings. So far as his outward character was concerned, he seemed of benefit to his city, and a credit to the nation.

He was the son of an author whose books no doubt graced his library in gorgeous bindings: Richard Grant White, an able and well-known commentator on Shakespeare. To be the son of an able man is sometimes a disadvantage, but it is a great help, in case ability on the part of one generation is added to that of another.

Thus we find the murdered man to be at one time in the enjoyment of enough blessings to make any reasonable person happy—as happiness goes in this world.

The man who killed White—Harry K. Thaw—had no gift of genius or talent; but he was the inheriting possessor of large quantities of money. It may be said that it is no credit to any one that he inherits wealth; but the same things might be said concerning ability, a good disposition, or a sound physical constitution. The fact simply is, that Thaw had too much money by inheritance, or maternal love, that his income went a long way beyond his necessities, and gave him the means for indulging in any wild dissipation he chose. He soon became famous on two contineuts for his reckless and spectacular expenditure of cash.

This man also had a father of ability; a man who had been able to bring together vast amounts of money, through his own acumen and industry, and through taking advantage of the circumstances around him. He was to a considerable extent a benefactor of the human race. He did not advertised his munificence very far, but his old neighbors in Pittsburg say that he kept an office open every working day in the year, for the relieving of distress. He met his wife, Harry K. Thaw's mother, from the circumstance of her impulsively throwing a rich finger-ring into a collection-basket when he was an usher, and his impulse to pursue and detect so charitable a communicant.

Still, these two fathers, White Senior and Thaw Senior, possessed other and less desirable qualities, which they may have bequeathed, unconsciously, to their sons. Richard Grant White was not without his feminine adventures and the same thing is reported of the elder Thaw. At any rate, the two sons seem to have both owed their downfall to utter disregard for sexual decencies of life.

Underneath Stanford White's talents seems to have lurked an utter disregard for the honor of woman. The same must be said of Harry Thaw; and it is not strange that they should have acquired a murderous hate for each other, on account of a frail creature whom both desired. Neither is it curious that one of them, "maddened" (perhaps insanely, perhaps not) at the other, should shoot him.

It has been a disgusting and pitiable drama—the trail that dragged its slimy length along. The tongues of people have dripped with it; the columns of the dailies have been smeared with it. It was thus carried into many a family circle, and children just old enough to read learned its miserable details. Coming from or going to school, those that had a cent could buy it, and with it a lot of other revolting matter. The damage this terrible case has done to the community can be felt, but not estimated.

What is the recompense for all this? Nothing, except that perhaps the community may learn that a good time for commencing to make a good citizen is as many generations back as possible; that even rich children should not be given too free a use of money; that bad literature, even though it be in daily papers, should be kept out of the family and the streets; and the lawlessness, even with the most exalted personages, must some time have its inevitable and gruesome reward.

Painful Accident to Young Lady.

From the Keyser letter to the Cumberland Times of yesterday afternoon the following relative to a young lady well known to many Oakland and Garrett county people is clipped:

Miss Nettie Lantz, who for several weeks has been staying with Mrs. John Johnson, St. James street, but whose home is at Mountain Lake Park, met with a very painful accident while on roller skates in the yard at Mrs. Johnson's home on Monday evening. In some way Miss Lantz fell on her limb, breaking it in two places right above the ankle. Dr. Hoffman and a trained nurse were immediately sent for to render proper medical aid. She left on the early train yesterday morning for her home at Mountain Lake Park.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. A. R. CARTER.

Mrs. A. R. Carter died April 23rd at the home of her daughter-in-law, Mrs. K. V. Hardy, Mt. Iake Park. Funeral services will be conducted at the residence Thurdsay afternoon at 2 o'clock, by the Rev. John A. McClelland, pastor of the Presbyterian Church, interment in the Odd Fellows Cemtery at Oakland. For several years the deceased lived with her niece, Mrs. Wm. Weber, on the Mt. Lake road. She was a sister to Miss E. B. Swan, late principal of Briar-Bend Seminary, and is survived by one brother Mr. Chas. H. Swan, of Milwaukee, Wis.

STEPHEN BROWNING.

As noted in this paper last Thursday, Mr. Stephen Browning, one of the leading citizens of this section of the county, died that morning at 11.30 o'clock, after a short illness of grip, followed on Wednesday by a slight stroke of paralysis. Mr. Browning was born August 3rd, 1835, and was therefore nearly 72 years of age. He was married to Miss Margaret Casteel, daughter of the late Willlam Casteel, to which union one child, now Mrs. Joseph T. Glotfelty, was born. Mr. Browning was a son of the late John L. Browning and was one of six brothers. Mesheck Browning, the great hunter of this part of the country, was his grandfather. For many years Mr. Browning has resided on his beautiful farm two miles southwest of Oakland. His funeral took place on Saturday morning from St. Paul's M. E. church, being conducted by Rev J. B. Workman, the pastor, with interment in the Oakland cemetery.

Taken to Orphans' Home.

Agent J. Ed. Kildow, of Elkins, for the State Humane Society, arrived from that city this morning on his way to Wheeling with seven small children, whom he was taking to the Children's Home in that city. Mr. Kildow is one of the most active agents of the Society in the state, and is doing a mighty good work in rescuing orphans and destitute little ones and sending them to the Wheeling Home where they are temporarily provided for, and in almost all cases permanent homes are secured for them in good families later.—Grafton Sentinel.

Mr. Leonard Lochner, of Cumberland, a former employe of this office, who spent two weeks or more with friends and relatives in Oakland and down in the Accident section, returned to Cumberland yesterday afternoon.

Dr. William W. Grant, of the Department of Dentistry, University of Maryland, arrived home from school Saturday night and has resumed his position in the Oakland Pharmacy, relieving Mr. Thomas Gonder, who has been made a member of the engineering corps of the Kendall Lumber Company.

The Board of County Commissioners advertises in this paper today the sale of the old jail and lot upon which it stands and also a lot purchased some years ago upon which the Board at that time intended erecting the new jail, but which fortunately they did not. The sale of the real estate will take place in front of the court house on May 15th, at 2 o'clock.

Mrs. D. H. Loar and family are now occupying their handsome new dwelling on Second street, into which they removed from the Ison house last week. The property is one of the handsomest and best arranged in this section of the country and it is the wish of all that more of the same character may be constructed with in the next few years.

Mrs. John H. Riley, of Elkins, West Va., was here last Saturday attending the funeral of her brother, the late Stephen Browning, which occurred on that day. Mrs. Riley is the wife of ex-Sheriff Riley of Garrett county, removing to Elkins many years ago, where they have since made their home.

Rev. J. A. McClelland of Oakland, Md., who recently accepted the call to the First Presbyterian church of Grafton, will preach his two initial sermons tomorrow morning and evening, at ten thirty a. m. and seven thirty, p. m. At the evening service the Christian Endeavor Society of the church will attend in a body, after holding a rally meeting in the lecture rooms. There will be music of a special nature at this service. Rev. McClelland is accompanied to the city by his wife. Next week they will move to Grafton and occupy the manse just next door to the church.—Grafton Sentinel.

One of the fashionable sins of the present time is the sin of idleness. This may not apply to the "club ladies" of our town, but this evil exists to an alarming extent, especially so in larger cities, where competent ladies flit away time as if there were no claims upon them in busy marts of life. There are persons whom the stress of circumstances compel to work, but the work is too often done under protest. There is a growing distaste for housekeeping. While all honest labor is honorable there is nothing more so than the care of the house.

OAKLAND MODEL STEAM BAKERY

Improvements At This Modern Establishment Completed.

Mr. Henry Lauer, proprietor of the Oakland Model Steam Bakery, has just had completed at his already well equipped plant improvements of a costly nature which were necessary by the great increase in business which has come to the establishment, brought by square dealing and the fact that Oakland Model Bakery Bread equals that that "mother bakes."

At the bakery a large and modernly constructed oven having a capacity of half a thousand loaves has been erected, along with an extension of the building for its accommodation and the installation of new and better machinery and utensils.

In the ice cream department arrangements have been completed whereby the largest order may be filled with but a few minutes' notice. The same can be said of the pastry department which has also been overhauled and made better than ever.

Oakland Model Bakery bread is known through three states and wherever introduced new customers are added and held.

The wages of women were never so high as now, yet it is almost impossible to procure the services of a good woman at any price, for the reason that labor is looked upon as degrading. Young women turned to all sorts of office work, where snares and temptations besets them because they can dress better and keep their hands whiter than they can when doing kitchen work.

The young men whose pockets are filled with cigarette wrappers, mustasche combs, finger nail cleaners, miniature curling irons, looking glass, etc., and their mothers crease their pants every day, are not the ones who will make promising husbands. The pockets of those who are helping to make the country bloom and causing two blades of grass to grow where God planted but one, will be found filled with barbed wire staples, and different sizes of nails and screws. They are the boys the girls had better look after.

If you have made up your mind to live in a town, then stand up for it, and if you know positively of no good, then silence is golden. Do all you can to help along every man who is engaged in legitimate business. Do not send away for everything nice you want and still expect the home men to keep a stock to suit the whim of one or two customers. The success of your fellow townsmen will be your success. No man liveth to himself and no man does business independently of his fellow business men. Take your home paper. Do not imagine the big dailies fill up all this space. There are many little crevices of good cheer, social sunshine, personal mentioned in the home paper that the big dailies do not print. Then do not abuse your neighbor. The main difference in the number of his faults and your own is that you see through a magnifying glass as a critic. The ill omened, the croaker, can do a town more harm in a minute than two good citizens can repair in a month.

Garrett County Telephone Company Elect New Secretary and Treasurer.

At a specially called meeting of the Board of Directors of the Garrett County Telephone Company, held last Thursday at Hoyes, Mr. James W. Beeghley, who has been secretary and treasurer for a number of years, tendered his resignation which was at once accepted.

The board divorced the office of secretary and treasurer by electing Mr. Clarence V. Guard to the former position and Mr. J. Arthur DeWitt as treasurer, both excellent selections and both young men of sterling character.

ENJOYED LIBERTY A FEW HOURS.

William O'Brian, Released from Jail In Morning, Went Back In Evening.

William O'Brian, released from jail Faiday morning last after serving thirty days for drunkenness, was returned Friday evening with a compound fracture of his leg received the same afternoon by being struck by the west bound accomodation train at Weber's which train brought him on to town and he was committed to the hospital ward where he will remain until he is well.

O' Bryan says that he is a coal miner by occupation, having worked near Morgantown and later at the Brydon mine on the Western Marylond Railroad.

CIRCUS HAS A POSTOFFICE

Also Carries Its Own Doctors, Lawyer and a Police Force.

The size of the Forepaugh and Sells Bros.' circus may be more readily imagined by the news that in order to handle the vast amount of mail received daily the establishment of a postoffice has become necessary. The circus postmaster gets the mail from the town office where the show is exhibiting, takes it to a specially equipped tent and there distributes and hands it out in regulation manner.

This big circus also has its own laundry, hospital, gas lighting plant, general stores, various paint, carpenter, blacksmith and repair shops, barber shop and hotel where 3,600 meals are served daily. It also carries a lawyer, a dentist, three detectives, and two doctors.

There is no longer a question that this circus leads all others in point of size as well as in the superiority of its various entertainments. As to novelty nothing can even approach it. One element which enters largely into the general excellence of the show is the policy of the management as regards the comfort and convenience of visitors. That everyone may feel secure, and that the grounds may be kept entirely free from everything objectionable, a corps of detectives is carried. Uniformed attendants are stationed throughout the grounds and in the tents to direct patrons, answer questions and see to the general comfort of all. A new system of seats and improved methods of handling guests have been installed and the results is that crowding, jostling and all confusion are unknown.

The band concert, which precedes the regular program, will be appreciated by all. The organization number 50 of the best soloists in the country and their selections are from the best popular music. The maintaining of a down-town branch ticket sale is still another of the many indications of thoughtfulness on the part of the management. This down-town sale is for the convenience of those who do not wish to wait at the ticket wagon. Reserved seats and admissions may be secured at the regular prices. Will show in Cumberland April 27.

The world's principal rider, the great Wallet, is among the forty equesterians with the Forepaugh and Sells Bros.' circus. He is giving an exhibition of the greatest bareback riding ever seen.

Provence Roses.

By VIRGINIA TAYLOUR.

Copyright, 1905, by Virginia Taylour.

IT was a mild December day—gray, damp and still. In a quaint old manor garden the yellow and white chrysanthemums continued to hold up their heads bravely, and a few belated stocks and violets tried to give a cheerful aspect to that desolate thing, a mixed border that in late autumn has not yet been set in order for the spring.

Today the color in the scene was supplied by the cap of a small boy and the red petticoats of some little girls. The occasion was scarcely one that called for gayety, for the group of persons assembled on the terrace, consisting of a father and his five children, varying in ages from six to sixteen, were gathered together for the purpose of planting a rose tree grown from a cutting which had been taken from the white Provence rose that bloomed above the mother's faroff grave.

Mr. Harcourt, carefully carrying the rose tree, headed the little procession from the conservatory to a lower garden inclosed by yew hedges and full now of leafless rose trees.

The children straggled after their father. Eleanor, the eldest girl, tried to lead by the hand the youngest child,

"SHE LOVED YOU THE BEST OF ALL OF US."

a sturdy boy of six, but he constantly broke away from her to prance in the exuberance of youthful spirits round his father. In the father's manner there certainly seemed to be more of the interest of the gardener than of the sentiment of the widower as he paused beside the plot of earth that had been prepared for the rose tree. He knelt down and with careful hands settled the little plant in its hole and then, keeping it upright, signed to Eleanor, who held a trowel, to put the earth over its roots.

When it was perceived that there was active dabbling in the earth connected with the ceremony, Johnnie, the youngest boy, was immediately seized with an ardent desire to assist.

"Let me help!" he cried, twisting himself with a scowl out of the grasp of an elder brother who tried to hold him.

"Oh, for shame, Johnnie!" "Be quiet, Johnnie!" came in varying tones of remonstrance from the others, except Eleanor, who said gently:

"Let him help. He is the youngest."

"Johnnie wants to help you, papa," Eleanor now said.

"Of course he shall help me, the dear little fellow!" he exclaimed.

The planting of the rose tree was thus accomplished under the fiction that Johnnie's help had been indispensable.

"Now," remarked Mr. Harcourt, rising and stepping back to survey the effect of his work, "if we don't have frost for a few days it ought to do very well. I hope it will, for, to my mind, this old white Provence moss rose is one of the loveliest roses imaginable. It has unfortunately been permitted to die out in most English gardens."

This speech hurt Eleanor. With the inconsequence of youth, she at once jumped to the conclusion that her father thought more of the intrinsic merits of the rose tree than of its tender associations, but the next moment he proved her wrong.

"It was your mother's favorite rose," he added in a different tone. He looked around upon the group. "Children," he said, "I should like to talk to you a little about your mother. She"— His eyes traveled over the faces of his five motherless children, all turned half expectantly, half shyly toward him. Something pathetic in the sight awoke the widower's dormant grief. His voice faltered a little. "She was good—good," he went on hurriedly. "I pray that you may all be like her."

He could say no more, but, turning away, disappeared behind the yew hedge that screened the garden from view.

For a moment the five children left behind stood silent and awed; then, moved by a common desire to escape from this unwonted sense of discomfort, all but Eleanor turned to run away.

Eleanor put out her hand and caught Johnnie by the sleeve of his jacket and detained him.

"Don't go yet, Johnnie," she said persuasively. "I want to talk to you about mother."

The child, subdued for the moment from his usual waywardness, yielded to her touch and voice.

"Oh, Johnnie," she said, and as she spoke the boy, with his head on her shoulder, inhaled the delicate fragrance of the roses at her breast and pinned to his own jacket, "mother loved you so! She loved you the best of all of us. I want you when you grow up to remember that. She used to hold you in her arms before she went away to die and kiss you and cry: 'Oh, that my baby may grow up to be a good man! Tell him he must always be good, honorable, brave and true.'"

The girl spoke passionately, excitedly, and the wondering child beside her, infected by her passion, listened to her, half understanding indeed, but none the less powerfully impressed. When his sister broke down in a storm of tears, he put his arm round her neck crying, while the scent of the roses penetrated yet more strikingly to his senses.

"I will be good, Nellie; I will indeed."

* * * * * * *

Thirty years had passed away since the white Provence rose had been planted in that yew sheltered manor garden. The rose had done well, and it—or others from its stem—still grew and blossomed there. But those who had witnessed the planting of the tree had long since gone their ways in time or in eternity. The elder brother lived alone in the old manor house. The younger had by divers ways acquired fame in a sphere of his own. He was called a great financier. Money grew under his touch. His name on the board of directors of any new company was an instant signal for investors, small and great, to venture their money boldly.

Though a very rich man and growing daily richer, he had never married. The interest of money making absorbed all his faculties.

He was sitting in his private room in the city one day late in June.

"This Finnish Fishtail company will work out very well for me," he said to himself. "But—I wish. Well, it is not my fault that there are so many fools in the world."

He rose and walked to the window and stood looking out across the crowded street. But it was evident that he was thinking of nothing that he saw there.

A tap at the door was followed by the entrance of one of his clerks. "There is a young lady who wishes to see you, sir," said the man somewhat hesitatingly, for he knew that he had failed in his duty when he had permitted it to become a question whether any young lady should or should not see John Harcourt. His nervousness was warranted. The financier frowned angrily.

"I never see young ladies or old ones either," he returned severely. "You know that perfectly well."

"I know, sir," the clerk answered deprecatingly. "But"—

"I begged so hard to be allowed to see you," interrupted a soft, girlish voice, and both men started and turned to the door to see standing there a maiden of two and twenty or thereabouts.

"Don't be angry with me," she pleaded as her auditors, rendered dumb by her audacity in appearing uninvited in the great man's sanctum, stood staring at her. "I followed him up. Don't send me away. It is so important that I should see you and ask your advice."

She was young and very pretty, and there was something irresistibly pathetic in her voice. The financier was, after all, but a man.

"Well," he answered, smiling, though a little grimly, "since you have contrived to evade the guardians of my privacy, you shall have the reward your courage deserves. Come in."

The clerk retired much relieved. John Harcourt handed the girl a seat and placed himself again before the writing table, facing her. She was slim, graceful, gray eyed and flaxen haired. But he had seen pretty girls before and was prepared not to allow her beauty to affect his judgment beyond reason. She was dressed in deep mourning, relieved only by a bunch of white roses tucked carelessly into the bosom of her gown.

"It is about the Finnish Fishtail shares that I want to ask you," she began.

His face contracted slightly, but he did not speak. He merely inclined his head to imitate that he was listening.

She wanted to know if he advised her to invest her money in them. She had come up from the country that morning expressly to ask his advice. She went on to explain very simply and clearly that since her father's recent death a certain sum of money had become her own. It was practically all hers and her mother's fortune. She had no trustees. She was at liberty to do what she would with it, and of course she and her mother were very anxious to get as large an income from it as possible. The Finnish Fishtail company offered so much higher interest than dull things like consols and railways.

"Only," she added, looking confidingly at him, "sometimes when you put your money into companies you lose it."

His face contracted again, but again he only nodded assent, his eyes fixed on the white roses tucked into her gown. They stirred some vague memory within him while he listened to the story she went on to tell him of a friend of her mother's, a widow with many children, who had put her money into the Banana Jelly company and had lost it all.

John Harcourt had made money by the Banana Jelly company in a perfectly legal way. He would make money, also in a perfectly legal way, by the Finnish Fishtail company, whether others lost or won.

"And now," the girlish voice went on, "the children are starving, and she is trying to support them by taking in needlework, which she does not know how to do. Is it not dreadful?"

"It is always a mistake for ladies who do not know how to watch the money market to invest in new companies. Better invest in consols. It is better to be content with a lower but safer interest," he concluded.

The girl looked disappointed, but she recognized the sincerity and finality of his tone. Murmuring something about having her train to catch, she rose to go. As she did so the bunch of roses in her gown fell to the floor. John Harcourt stooped to pick them up, and as he took them in his hand their fragrance penetrated to his senses, and the vague memory that had half unconsciously disturbed him for the last quarter of an hour started into distinct shape before him.

The present faded from his view. The years rolled back, and he stood, once more a child, in the yew hedged manor garden. He lived again through the scene of the planting of the rose tree.

How had he fulfilled the hope of that prayer? He stood so long holding the roses in his hand and looking down at them with the look of one whose mind was far away that the girl wondered.

"I must go," she said at last. "Thank you very much for your kindness in advising me."

Her voice recalled him to the present. He looked at her. She was holding out her hand for the roses.

"If you really wish to thank me," he said, "give me these."

For an instant she stiffened, her young dignity wounded. But when she glanced at him she realized that there was no thought at all of her behind the request, and the stiffening fell from her.

"With pleasure," she answered simply.

"Where did you get them?"

He asked the question as he crossed the room to open the door for her.

"From a lovely old yew hedged garden which the lady with whom I am staying in Hampshire took me to see yesterday," she replied.

"Ah!"

The exclamation was so sharp that the girl once more looked at him in surprise, but his face was impassive. He was holding the door open for her. As she passed out he said:

"If you know any one who has shares in the Finnish Fishtail company, tell them to sell at once."

He closed the door behind her and, sitting down again at the writing table, laid the roses before him.

From his mother's garden! It was years since he had walked in that garden in the time of roses. His brother's life and his lay far apart. It was but rarely that he could find time to run down for a day's visit to the old home, but now as he sat with his head in his hands and the scent of the roses floating up to his nostrils he was there again. It was from the roses on his sister's breast that the scent came, bringing with it her voice:

"Oh, Johnnie, you must never do anything that mother in heaven would grieve over!"

Would she grieve over the ruin of those widows and orphans whose folly was no fault of his?

That gentle sister had long since passed away, but now as he looked back on his own early life and hers he saw how faithfully she had striven to fulfill a mother's part to him. He remembered once hearing some one say, "That girl is her mother over again."

Once more his arms were round her neck, and with the scent of the roses permeating his senses he was promising that he would never do anything that might grieve his mother in heaven.

DESIRED THE CLERK TO HAVE IT POSTED AT ONCE.

He bowed his head upon the roses, and long unaccustomed tears rose to his eyes.

Half an hour later he had written a letter which made him liable for all the money which the ignorant public had invested in the Finnish Fishtail company. He rang the bell and desired the clerk to have it posted at once.

John Harcourt knew himself. He knew that tomorrow he would probably regret his action and curse himself for a sentimental fool, but tomorrow it would be too late. The deed would be done, as far at least as the Finnish Fishtail company was concerned.

He walked out of his office financially a much poorer man than he had been for many years. Morally? He inhaled the fragrance of the roses and for that day at least murmured, "Thank God."

CORRECT PRUNING.

The Right and Wrong Way Illustrated and Described.

The question frequently arises when to prune. Among the earlier horticulturists this question was often answered as follows: Prune when your knife is sharp. This is a comparatively safe method to follow with some plants, but where the problem involves the management of extensive commercial plantations it is not so easy to prune in this miscellaneous fashion, remarks New England Homestead. The work must necessarily be done at some particular season and carried on in a systematic manner after some definite plan.

With most orchardists and gardeners pruning can best be done during the winter or early spring months, and where the object is the removal of small branches this season is undoubtedly quite as satisfactory as any other. In fact, pruning during late spring, about the time or just previous to the beginning of growth, is particularly advantageous with the peach, because at that season, as a rule, all injury to the animal growth from winter killing will be apparent, and the pruner can take advantage of this to remove all dead or injured branches and at the same time modify his plan so as to leave a maximum quantity of wood in order to secure a profitable crop of fruit, which might not be possible were the usual practice of removing half the annual growth followed in such seasons.

With apple and pear, which suffer less from winter killing, the annual pruning can as well be done in March in the north as at any other season. With the grape, however, which is likely to produce a heavy flow of sap if the pruning is delayed until late in the season, it is undoubtedly best to do the pruning during the late fall and early winter months.

When the pruning involves the removal of annual growth rather than large branches, the cut should invariably be made immediately above a bud, as shown in the first figure at A. Never cut as indicated at B, C and D. All wounds that are made should be left smooth—that is, if it is necessary to use a saw in removing a large branch the cut surface should be left smooth and clean, particularly around the edges.

To obtain best results in removing large branches two cuts should be made—that is, the branch should be sawed off eighteen or twenty inches above the point of its origin to prevent splitting down and tearing off a considerable portion of the bark. After the weight of the branch has been lessened by cutting away the main part a second cut can be made and the stub held in position until the cut is completed. This prevents the splitting down and tearing of the bark which are likely to result from the careless removal of large branches.

The evil results of splitting can be overcome frequently by cutting first on the under side of the limb and then upon the upper side, as shown in the second figure, so that the breaking of the tissue occurs near the middle of the wound instead of at one side. When this is the case, tearing and splitting seldom occur.

Farmers' Institutes.

Not the least of the benefits of farmers' institutes is that they are teaching farmers to think when standing on their feet and facing an audience. The old fashioned farmer felt bungling and awkward in public. He could sit and see holes in the other fellow's argument, but he became speedily a victim of stage fright when he arose to express his own views.—Iowa Homestead.

Burn the Branches.

Never leave prunings of trees and bushes lying round. Burn them in the garden fire, and you will know then that all the insects upon them are destroyed. The wood ash, too, is an excellent fertilizer for every crop grown, but especially useful for tomatoes and all fruits.—Gardening.

The San Jose Louse.

The scale under which the louse hides is impervious to most insecticides, and during a certain season the louse can crawl about or be carried from place to place by birds, heavy winds, etc. Strong, healthy trees soon succumb to the attacks.—Farm Journal.

Colleges Cannot Afford to Accept Tainted Money.

By THOMAS W. PHILLIPS, Father of the Industrial Commission and Proposer of the Bureau of Corporations.

ALL colleges or churches that contemplate soliciting or receiving contributions from Rockefeller or his $43,000,000 education fund should secure from the department of justice the charge made by direction of the attorney general in November, 1906, and now pending against Rockefeller and the Standard Oil company in the circuit court at St. Louis, in which it is set forth "that said Rockefeller and his associates, in or about the year 1870 and at all times since, HAVE BEEN ENGAGED IN A CONSPIRACY to restrain and monopolize trade in petroleum" and "that said trust did crush out and eliminate competition by rebates and secret preferential rates," etc.

After using nearly 300 pages of type to recite the combinations and conspiracies against the laws and in derogation of the COMMON RIGHTS OF ALL THE PEOPLE of the United States committed by John D. Rockefeller and his associates, the attorney general says, "To set forth all the places and instances would render this bill unduly voluminous."

CAN ANY COLLEGE AFFORD TO TAKE ORDERS OR MONEY FROM SUCH A SOURCE?

It is speciously stated that there are no "tainted dollars," that all dollars are alike and that institutions of benevolence are built by contributions from all persons WITHOUT REGARD TO THE SOURCE FROM WHICH THEY COME. It is also stated as an apology for the acceptance of "tainted dollars" that they have been contributed for religious and missionary purposes. But it must be borne in mind that no benevolent or religious society should solicit or receive them AS SUCH.

A monopoly or trust is the segregating for the benefit of one or a few of that which was formerly the COMMON RIGHT OF ALL. The fundamental principles of our government forbid the granting of such privileges. Yet this power has been usurped and used to practice EXTORTION on the whole people.

Take, for instance, the industry in which the Standard Oil company accumulated its vast wealth, sometimes depressing the price of oil and buying large producing properties, then advancing the price and assessing the world TO PAY FOR THE SAME. They fix the price at which they buy, transport and sell. Thus they have made the people who are wholly dependent on the oil industry SERFS.

THEIR PROFITS REAPED FROM THIS SERFDOM HAVE BEEN GOVERNED ONLY BY THEIR GREED, AND THEIR ACCUMULATION OF WEALTH AND ENORMOUS DIVIDENDS HAVE STARTLED THE WORLD.

If educational institutions and benevolent and Christian organizations solicit or receive "tainted dollars" which are contributed from this source, they are mistaken. Such institutions must remember that the people will live, BUT THE STANDARD OIL COMPANY WILL DIE and right will prevail. Furthermore, the informed will not bequeath money to nor educate their children in schools where moral culture may be HANDICAPPED by such gifts.

Corporations Have Aided the Country.

By General THOMAS H. HUBBARD of New York.

IN its present state public opinion in its attitude toward corporations can only be termed MORAL HYSTERIA.

CORPORATIONS ARE THE ONE THING WHICH HAVE STOOD BETWEEN THIS NATION AND DISASTER IN PREVENTING A PREPONDERANCE OF INDIVIDUAL WEALTH.

A mighty outcry is raised against the large gas companies, the railroad companies and the insurance companies. Some champion of the people who spends his time in poring over Poor's Manual declares that the gas companies can and do manufacture their product for 30 or 35 cents a thousand feet.

The people listen and forget that there are OTHER EXPENSES TO BE MET by the company aside from the actual cost of production. They are not aware that electrolysis, of which they know little or nothing, is constantly wearing out the mains almost as soon as they can be installed. They do not realize that the company is really supplying its product at a price combining cost and ONLY A MODEST PROFIT. They forget that thousands of persons are dependent for their income upon the earnings of a corporation in which their money is invested and that these persons have a right to ask for a reasonable return on the money invested.

Our railroads are surpassed by none in the world except in so far as regards loss of life through accident. The remedy for this is to permit the roads to EARN ENOUGH to pay for the installation of expensive safety systems.

BUT INSTEAD OF AIDING THE ROADS SOME PERSON DISCOVERS THAT THERE ARE SUCH THINGS AS SECRET REBATES AND IMMEDIATELY HE CRIES ALOUD FOR AN INVESTIGATION, NOT WAITING TO LEARN THAT THE ROADS THEMSELVES HAVE BEEN ATTEMPTING TO REMEDY THIS WRONG.

We Should Pity the "400."

By Professor CHARLES ZUEBLIN, University of Chicago.

THE members of the "400" don't get ANYTHING out of life. Their perspective is narrow, they only have a small circle of friends, and they are constantly meeting the same faces. They intermarry and intermarry, with the result that finally their children are marked in the same way that the children of the aristocracy are marked—they are without vigor, WITHOUT PURPOSE, without ambition.

THE REALLY BIG PEOPLE ARE NEVER AFRAID OF LOSING ANYTHING BY MINGLING WITH ALL CLASSES. ONE CAN MEASURE THE REAL STATURE OF A WOMAN BY HER INTERESTS.

REVERSED BY THE PEOPLE

English Voters Call a Halt as to Municipal Ownership.

The most dramatic incident in the history of municipal government occurred on Nov. 1, when the greatest city in the world reversed its policy in regard to municipal ownership by an overwhelming vote. For several years the "Progressives," as the municipal ownership party called itself, have controlled the London county council, which has charge of most matters affecting the city as a whole, and of seventeen of the twenty-eight borough councils, which deal with local matters, one borough being nonpartisan. After the borough council election on Nov. 1 this party was left in control of but two boroughs, having elected with their allies, the so called "Laborites," only 202 councilmen out of 1,362. That it was a popular and not a class victory is shown by the fact that the "Progressives" were beaten worst in the boroughs where the heaviest vote was cast.

Such a political upheaval must have an adequate cause, and the cause in the case was the rapid increase in taxes, and consequently rents, which resulted from the taking over by the city or its boroughs of tramways, electric lighting, waterworks, etc., the building of luxurious public baths and other expenditures of public money out of all proportion to the results attained. This lavishness had raised the borough tax rate in the boroughs controlled by the "Progressives" 40 per cent above the rate in the other boroughs. A few examples of the losses incurred may be of interest.

In Islington the street lighting costs nearly three times as much per mile as in the boroughs lighted by private companies. In St. Pancras the cost is nearly as high, while in Woolwich, in spite of the high cost, the loss for the current year is expected to reach $50,000. In Bermondsey and Southwark the councils have refused an offer from a private company to light the streets at half the cost under municipal management. The same condition exists in commercial lighting, for the Aerated Bread company found that the bills for its depots in municipally lighted boroughs were 116 per cent higher than the rate paid to private companies.

In Shoreditch the palatial public baths, built within a stone's throw of baths erected by a local philanthropist, are now closed for lack of custom, though interest must still be paid on the investment and the borough has lost the taxes previously paid by the property. And in Poplar each bath taken in the public baths costs the taxpayers 20 cents in addition to what the bather pays for his ticket.

In this borough cases were proved in which outdoor relief was given to families earning $500 a year, equivalent to $850 in this country, while the fare in the workhouse was better than could be afforded by the average independent wage earner.

Examples of this sort could be multiplied indefinitely, and the same conditions exist in the work carried on by the London county council, which, for example, is paying 47 per cent more for inferior brickwork than the standard contract price for the best work. The failure of its municipal ferry is typical of its waste of public money, and the county council election to be held next spring is expected to result similarly to the borough council election.

The Pall Mall Gazette sums the situation up by saying:

"You may confiscate capital, but you cannot confiscate that mighty force of self interest which belongs to the great generating station of all human activity. Municipal trading, conducted by amateurs and financed out of an open and bottomless pocket, can never be more than a weak and false imitation of real commerce and industry. If the city council collected its capital by the issue of prospectuses to the public, who would invest a sovereign on the faith of its promises or the reputation of its directing committees? And if the ratepayer is wise he will take care that his money does not find its way by compulsion into speculations where he most assuredly would never place it by choice."

Taxes Rising In Scotland.

Consul Rufus Fleming of Edinburgh calls attention in a recent report to the fact that during the ten years ending 1904 local taxation per capita has increased more than 42 per cent. He further states that taxes are especially high in Glasgow, Aberdeen and Paisley, the three Scotch cities that have gone deepest into municipal ownership, and adds that "the conclusion seems unavoidable that, whatever benefits municipal ownership may have bestowed upon the masses, it has not tended to lighten the burdens of taxpayers." This is emphasized by the added fact that during the last fiscal year of the series the running expenses of all of the revenue producing municipal undertakings of Scotland exceeded the receipts by 10 per cent in spite of the ridiculously small depreciation allowance and the transferring to other accounts of large items of expense.

Want to Let Go, but Can't.

Do you remember how you felt the first time you took hold of an electric battery? It felt rather pleasant at first, but as the operator turned on more current it became very unpleasant, and you wanted to let go, but couldn't. That's the way most citizens feel in places where the city does its own lighting. They've got hold of an electric plant and want to let go, but can't.

Bonds for municipal plants increase taxes. Taxes increase the cost of living and of doing business.

SPRING SOWING.

Wisconsin Farmer's Ideas on Seeding Grain Crops.

While it is desirable to sow oats and spring wheat early, there is a liability of doing it too soon. Of course no one will sow in snow, but some cultivate land in spring before it has dried off. That this is liable to make the soil lumpy is well known, but it also hinders speedy drying. Just examine the soil surface closely. It will be found full of an infinite number of cracks and crevices. It is through these that moisture escapes. By stirring the soil the openings are closed (covered), and of course the excessive water in the soil is prevented from escaping. This is exactly what has been recommended for corn culture, but in spring it is out of place.

So says a Wisconsin farmer in Rural New Yorker, where he gives this fuller explanation of his ideas: Where wet springs are followed by dry periods some may think that land should be worked early to prevent the escape of moisture. This is not correct, for excessive water must be removed before seed can sprout properly and grow well. Understand that surface cultivation, which is so much recommended now, does not preserve a large amount of moisture in the first six or eight inches of soil, but prevents the escape of that constantly brought from the water table several feet in the ground by capillary attraction.

Working the Land.

For best results with spring grains the soil must be well prepared. On account of the rush of spring work this is more liable to be neglected than the good preparation of corn or potato land. The first working should be with an implement that will tear up the soil well. An ordinary peg tooth harrow cannot do this. A spring tooth harrow, a disk harrow and an ordinary riding corn cultivator all do good work. Of the three the spring tooth harrow is the least desirable. It rathers corn stubble and other trash too much. This can be said of a corn cultivator, too, but it is not so bad as the former implement. The disk harrow is really the best implement for loosening the packed soil in spring. The revolving disks will not gather heaps of trash, but rather cut it up. That is a great point in favor of them, for such heaps cause much trouble in the after work of harrowing and drilling and may cause this yet when cutting the grain. One working up and one or two harrowings before seeding and two harrowings after sowing will make a good seed bed on most soils. More working may be necessary on some soils.

SEED CORN TEST.

Important Point In Securing a Good Stand In the Field.

For testing corn take a tight wooden box eighteen inches square and four to six inches deep (or of some convenient dimensions), put in two or three inches of moist sand and cover with a piece of white muslin which has been ruled into squares about two inches across. Have the seed corn laid on a table or shelf where it will not be disturbed. From the first ear take kernels from near the butt, middle and tip of ear, then turn the ear over and take three more kernels from the other side. Place these six kernels in the first check or square (No. 1); take six kernels from the second ear and place in the second square (No. 2), etc., until you have sampled all of the ears. Cover the grain carefully with another piece of cloth about the same size as the box and also with a second piece of cloth enough larger to extend up on the sides to the top of the box. Put in one or two inches more of moist sand and keep the box in the ordinary living room temperature of the house. Add more water if the sand becomes too dry. The corn should germinate in from three to five days. Those ears whose kernels do not all germinate in five days should be discarded.

Good Feed For Piglings.

Shorts, although as a rule much superior to bran for pigs, are not infrequently so coarse or contain so much fiber as to be very little better than bran for young pigs. Good shorts, however—that is, shorts containing a fairly liberal admixture of white material—are certainly a most excellent feed for pigs of all classes. Under such conditions they are among the very best single feeds for young ones just weaned. A slight admixture of oil meal improves it.

After Milking.

Milk is often spoiled by allowing it to stand in the barn too long after it is drawn. It readily absorbs odors from the air, and odors of the barn are usually very much in evidence. For this reason the milk should be quickly removed to a place free from odors.

A New Disease.

A new disease of the strawberry has appeared in Michigan. It is very similar to the root rot of tobacco plants. No remedy has yet been found that is a specific.—National Stockman and Farmer.

To pay this amount it was ascertained that the taxable property as shown by the Assessment Books amounts to $8,175,485.00, which, at 93 cents on the $100 will make the above amount for County purposes—$76,031.76.

Deducting $635,419.00 for Corporations paying direct to the State Treasurer leaves the basis $7,540,039.00 at 16 cents on each $100, makes $12,064.06, and this added makes the taxes for State and County purposes $88,095.82.

GARRETT COUNTY FARMERS

In the Vicinity of Grantsville Are Away in the Lead.

The following article clipped from last week's edition of the Elk Lick (Pa.) Star, is highly complimentary to the farmers of the Grantsville section of Garrett county and is also equally applicable to other parts of the county:

"Right here The Star wishes to compliment the farmers in the vicinity of Grantsville, Md., on the splendid condition and high productive state that they have brought their farms up to. About 25 or 30 years ago the farmers in the vicinity of Salisbury, Pa., were far in advance of their Garrett county neighbors in the matter of high class farming; but, generally speaking, just the reverse is the case now, and there is no use in trying to deny it.

"It is pretty generally conceded that farming in Elk Lick township has been on the down grade for a number of years. Of course, there are exceptions, and old Elk Lick still has some of the best managed and most highly productive farms to be found anywhere. But in many cases is is painfully evident that the sons who are now managing the farms are not the progressive and painstaking farmers that their fathers were before them. Many good farms have been allowed to run down. The land, fences and buildings are not kept up as they should be, the sugar camps are not being properly cared for, good orchards have been allowed to die off without new ones to take their places.

"This deplorable state of agricultural degeneracy cannot be said to exist in the vicinity of Grantsville. The farms out there are, almost without exception, in the pink of high class agricultural condition. For every good fruit tree that grew in the vicinity of Grantsville 25 years ago, scores of them are growing now. And in all other respects the farmers of Grantsville district are in the very forefront of the noble pursuit of agriculture and cattle raising. If you want to see fruitful farms, luxuriantly growing crops, fine sugar groves, apple orchards, well kept buildings, fences, etc., make a trip to Grantsville before the next harvest is garnered.

"In the meantime, the farmers of old Elk Lick, that is, a great many of them, ought to go to Garrett county and take lessons in farming, then get a hump on themselves and bring their farms back to the splendid condition they were in when Garrett county was at least 25 years behind the times in agriculture."

K. of G. E. Lecture.

A lecture on the principals of the order of Knights of the Golden Eagle will be delivered by Rev. E. J. Westfall, in the M. E. church, Mt. Lake Park, on the evening of May 8th at 8 o'clock. All members of Olive Branch Castle will meet at 7.30 o'clock p. m., promptly. Lecture free to everybody and all are cordially invited.

A NEW SUPERVISOR OF ELECTIONS FOR COUNTY

Mr. Peter A. Chisholm, of Oakland, Named by Governor Warfield.

Last Thursday Governor Edwin Warfield appointed Mr. Peter A. Chisholm, of Oakland, as a member of the Board of Election Supervisors for Garrett county, in place of Mr. Thomas Little, recently of Oakland, but now residing at Gormania, West Va., who resigned his office several weeks ago.

The appointment of Mr. Chisholm to the position was quite a surprise to many Democrats who were unaware that Mr. Little had resigned his office. The latter was President of the Board since its organization more than a year ago and gave general satisfaction.

Mr. Chisholm will qualify as a member of the Board within a short time and will likely be made its president. Other members of the Board are Messrs. James E. McGettigan, of Accident, who is a Democrat, and Edward E. Sollars, of near Oakland, who is a Republican.

Married

GNAGEY—BRUMBAUGH—A very pleasant wedding occurred at the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Brumbaugh on last Thursday evening when their daughter Bessie was joined in marriage to A. Lloyd Gnagey. The ceremony that united the young couple was pronounced by Rev. S. A. Blessing in the presence of a number of friends and relatives. A sumptuous wedding feast was served and the couple was the recipients of a number of elegant presents.

Mr. and Mrs. Gnagey will leave on Saturday next for the west, stopping at different points to visit with relatives and will journey on to Los Angeles, California, and attend the Brethren conference. They expect to return to West Milton by July and make their home here.

Among the guests of the wedding were: Mr. and Mrs. John Gnagey, parents of the groom; Misses Effie and Ada Gnagey, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Gnagey, Mr and Mrs. William H. Gnagey.—West Milton (O.) Record, April 24.

Will Join Baltimore Presbytery.

The Oakland Presbyterian church, which has belonged to the Grafton Presbytery since the formation of that body, has decided to withdraw from the Grafton and join the Baltimore body. The official action has been taken and the matter is now in the hands of the Baltimore body for action. A new minister from that body will be called soon and the officers hope to have a pastor for the church in the near future.

HIGHER PAY FOR RURAL DELIVERY

Schedule of Increased Salaries For Carriers—Detailed Adjustment Worked Out.

No branch of the public service is of more interest to the rural population of the country than the rural delivery of mail matter. It has had a phenomenal development, and careful administration and efficient management has brought with it increased responsibilities for the rural carriers. These employes are required to perform services in a suitable conveyance which they must furnish themselves.

The Postoffice Department, having these facts in mind, succeeded during the last session of Congress in securing substantial recognition for this class of employes through an increase of upwards of $6,000,000 in the appropriation for the next fiscal year.

The calculations incident to a proportionate distribution of the amount appropriated under authority of Congress—to increase the maximum salaries of rural carriers to not exceeding $900 per annum—necessarily required most careful consideration. The work has been progressing under the immediate supervision of the fourth assistant postmaster general and the superintendent of the rural delivery.

Postmaster General Meyer has approved the detailed adjustment, and the new schedule, which will become effective July 1, 1907, will make a graded increase in the compensation of carriers of from 9 to 25 per cent., based upon the number of miles traversed by carriers as shown by the records of the department. The readjustment adopted will involve an expenditure for rural services during the next fiscal year of nearly $35,000,000. The schedule is as follows:

| Routes. | Per Annum. |
|---|---|
| 24 or more miles | $900 |
| 22 to 24 miles | 864 |
| 20 to 22 miles | 810 |
| 18 to 20 miles | 720 |
| 16 to 18 miles | 630 |
| 14 to 16 miles | 540 |
| 12 to 14 miles | 504 |
| 10 to 12 miles | 468 |
| 8 to 10 miles | 432 |
| 6 to 8 miles | 396 |

HOYES.

Since our last writing there has been quite a change in the atmosphere. We are now having fine spring weather and farmers in this community are all taking advantage of it in plowing, sowing oats, planting potatoes, etc.

Mr. A. C. DeWitt was taken very seriously ill last Saturday night. He had suffered for some time with a severe cold but grew worse and was threatened with pneumonia, but at this writing is very much improved. Dr. Mason is attending him.

Miss Lizzie Welch returned to her home Tuesday after spending some time with her sister Miss Ethel at Westminster.

Mrs. Maggie DeWitt and daughter Miss Mae, who spent the winter in Pennsylvania, are in Hoyes packing their household goods to move to Dayton, Ohio, where they expect to locate.

Miss Cecelia Miller, of near Deer Park, is assisting Mrs. M. Mattingly with her house cleaning.

Mrs. Ralph Friend and little daughter of Landstreet, Pa., are spending some time with Mrs. Friend's parents, Mr. and Mrs. F. D. DeWitt.

Messrs. Norris Welch and Burns Lowdermilk, both students of Oakland Normal, spent last Saturday and Sunday at their homes and returned to Oakland Sunday night.

Mrs. M. Mattingly was very pleasantly entertained at the home of Mrs. Silas Cuppett last Sunday afternoon.

Mr. Albert DeWitt, wife and children, of Friendsville, were visiting Mr. Rufus DeWitt Saturday and Sunday.

Mr. Henry Miller and son Harold, of near Grantsville, made a business trip to Mr. George E. Bishoff's one day this week.

Mr. H. R. DeWitt and wife, of Oakland, spent last Sunday and Monday with Mr. DeWitt's father at this place,

Miss Ethel DeWitt left this place one day last week for Mr. C. Glotfelty's near Crellin, where she will nurse her aunt, who is suffering with an attack of measles.

Mr. and Mrs. Abel DeWitt, of Armstead, were calling on their friends in Hoyes part of last week.

Mr. William Callis made a business trip to Oakland one day last week.

FOREST FIRE PROTECTION.

Wardens Have Been Appointed for Garrett County By Governor Warfield.

A number of Forest Wardens have been appointed in Garrett County to enforce the state laws and to assist in protecting forest lands. Those that have already been commissioned by the Governor are Nathan C. Browning, Sang Run; George W. Michaels, Westernport; W. D. Steyer, Steyer, and D. W. Wilson, Wilson.

Forest lands are increasing rapidly in value and those who have their money invested in them should receive as full protection from the State as it is possible to give. The same is true of farmers who have small woodlots. It is the duty of the State to afford protection to private forest property just as much as it is the duty of the city to provide protection for private residences in its expensive fire fighting equipment. Taxes are paid on forest lands for the protection which the State gives to the owner and for public improvements just as much as in the case of the city property owner.

The forest wardens will post fire warning notices in conspicuous places, calling attention to the fire laws and penalties for their violation. Each resident should become acquainted with these laws and cooperate with the forest wardens in enforcing them, for it is in their strict enforcement that we may hope to make investment in forest lands safe, and to increase the productiveness of our forest.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Dr. J. W. Laughlin, wife and daughter returned to their home here Monday evening, after having been at Grafton for several days at the death and burial of Helen, the grand-daughter of the doctor.

Rev. E. J. Westfall will preach Sunday evening a 8 o'clock. Subject: "Infant Church Membership." All invited.

The Central Grocery Company opened up business in the Hocking store room this week, with Mr. C. W. Hopkins in charge.

A surprise party was given Mr. and Mrs. Fouch at their new home in the Park Tuesday evening by the young people of the neighborhood.

The erection of the new postoffice building is being pushed forward with commendable energy. The concrete foundation has been completed and the carpenters are getting the frame ready for raising.

Another large building will be erected this season just across the boardwalk from the postoffice building to be used as a skating rink and lunch room.

The Allegany House was opened by the lessee, Mr. Preston, this week. This popular house will be put in good condition for the accommodation of the public.

Mr. and Mrs. Reedy, recently married, will occupy rooms in the Canton cottage with the family of Mr. G. H. Pritchard.

Gay W. Hayden is again in Mr. H. E. Felty's store in the Park.

Mr. C. F. Dawson has the contract to repaper and paint the M. E. church.

Rev. J. P. McKee and wife were in the Park last week looking after their cottage. While here Rev. McKee staked off the location for a new cottage on his lot at the corner of G street and Baltimore avenue. Mr. McKee also contemplates the erection of several buildings on his tract of land near the lake.

Mr. John D. Hayden returned from Snow Hill, Md., Saturday, where he attended the Grand Council of the Red Men as a delegate from the local tribe.

Mr. J. P. Allen was at the Park this week looking after his cottage. His family will be here soon.

Mrs. Reed, of Fairmont, W. Va., is temporarily occupying the Hull cottage on E street. Mrs. Reed is convalescing from a siege of typhoid fever. She is rapidly gaining strength.

Capt. J. A. Hayden, will leave next Wednesday morning on a tour of the State in the interest of the U. S. Department of Agriculture. The trip will occupy about three weeks and will take in every county in the state.

Mr. Thomas Harris moved into the Custer cottage this week.

BARTHOLOMEW HILEMAN KILLED ON RAILROAD

Body Was Picked Up By Trainman of No. 8 Yesterday Morning.

The body of Bartholomew Hileman, an old man residing on the DeBerry farm at Corinth, just over the Garrett county line, was picked up by the trainmen of passenger train No. 8 yesterday morning at a point midway between the Youghiogheny River bridge and Offutt's three miles west of Oakland, and brought here where the remains were turned over to the authorities.

Justice Gonder, in his capacity as Coroner, had a jury of inquest summoned enquire into the manner in which the man came to his death. The jury had as its foreman Mr. D. M. Mason. Dr. M. C. Hinebaugh as the coroner's physician, after making an examination of the remains, gave it as his opinion that death was due to a blow upon the head, which crushed the skull, and that in all probabilty the man had been struck by a train and that he had been dead a number of hours. The verdict of the jury was in accordance with the physician's testimony.

The dead man was quite aged, and many years ago came to Oakland from the vicinity of Friendsville or Selbysport where he has a large number of relatives yet residing.

Shortly after the jury was discharged a grandson of Mr. Hileman arrived here from Corinth and had the body prepared for burial and shipped to Rinard's near Terra Alta, where the funeral will take place today.

Just Wipe The Whiskers Off.

There is consternation among the barbers of England over the invention of a Londoner named Witherington. He has made a paste which removes the beard in ten minutes without the use of a razor. The paste makes the hair so brittle that it can be rubbed off clean with a wet sponge.

"No skin trouble" is guaranteed and the performance is simply a part of washing the face upon arising in the morning. The following advantages are claimed for the paste: No punctilious barber to ask if the razor is sharp enough no second man waiting to brush your hat and his manner ask for a tip. You rub on the paste, wipe it off with the sponge, and presto! you go down to coffee and rolls looking like a man fresh from the best barber in London. The cost is about one cent a shave—and you tip yourself.

HOUSE BURNED AT SANG RUN.

Building Was Vacant and Was Owned by Silas F. Cuppett, of Elder.

A frame dwelling house located at Sang Run and owned by Mr. Silas F. Cuppett, of Elder, this county, was burned to the ground last Saturday night about eleven o'clock.

The building was vacant but was to have been occupied on Monday by Samuel McCrobie, who discovered the fire and gave the alarm.

Adjoining the burned building was another house belonging to Mr. Cuppett and next to it is located the store and dwelling of Mr. S. J. Thomas. These two buildings were saved from destruction only through the hard work of the people of the neighborhood who assembled and fought the fire with water from the river and wells.

The burned building was one and a-half stories high and was valued at several hundred dollars, which will be a total loss, as there was no insurance.

Letter to Henry Lauer.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: If you should bake bread that people like better than any other, and at less cost by the day, you'd have a pretty-good business, wouldn't you.

We have just such a business as that in paint; a gallon goes further than any other gallon of paint in the country—that's bread at less cost by the day; but the difference isn't so small as it is in bread. And a job wears longer—that's bread at less cost by the year. People hate to paint; it costs money to paint; and they hate the fuss. They like our bread by the year.

If your bread is better than anybody-else's, and costs less too, you've got a good trade; for people do like good bread; and people like money. It doesn't take long to find-out; give 'em time.

But you can't bake better-than-anybody else's bread for half the usual price for a breakfast, can you?

Devoe is just such paint as that. The price by the gallon or loaf is no matter. Count by the day week month year lifetime. Devoe it the bread. We hope yours is as good.

Yours truly,

24 F. W. DEVOE & Co.

FARMERS IN A RELIGIOUS PANIC

Alleged Mysterious Pictures on Wall Near Hancock Cause Consternation.

The Hagerstown Mail says: That portion of Morgan county, across the Potomac river from Hancock, is in a state of excitement over the strange pictures, said to represent scenes in heaven and hell, that have appeared on the wall of a room in the house of Emory Lopp, and people are traveling for miles to the house to view the wonderful pictures.

The house, which is located in the hill region about two miles from Hancock Station, is a modern structure, and a modest home. How the scenes, said to be depicted upon the walls, in such weird and fantastic shapes came there is a complete mystery and superstitious people firmly believe that some supernatural power has been at work and that the pictures are a prophecy of things to happen. As a result of the talk that has spread around concerning the mysterious delineations excitement has been growing right along until the whole country is aroused and every day numbers of people go to the house to look upon the walls.

A gentleman from Hancock was informed by a man of reliable standing who visited the house to inspect the walls, that the reports concerning the affair are true. He said no human hand could have painted the scenes on the walls that appears in outlines representing angels and devils, snakes and other weird creatures that crawl and fly and beautiful vistas and pits of flaming fires in such strong and striking contrast that the observer is awed by the seeming presence of some unseen power, and its work.

Mr. Lopp the owner of the house, is at loss to account for the mystifying affair. He said he first noticed the pictures about a month ago. At first the wall appeared to be discolored, as by smoke, and gradually the scenes began to take shape and outlines became clearer and he called some neighbors in to inspect the scenes. They too, were struck by the weird shapes and scenes upon which they looked with wondering eyes and the news went abroad until everybody in that section of the county became interested in the matter.

A well known Hancock physician, who was driving in that section the other day, passed the house of mystery and counted about thirty teams hitched along the road. Others were on the way to the house having been attracted by the reports of the strange things to be seen there.

The prophecies that have been made that the world is to come to an end on June 10 by coming in contact with a comet has added to the excitement which prevails concerning the pictures in the house and many believe that this is a premonition or warning for people to prepare for the finale of all things on that date.

Some of the best people of Morgan county have become interested in the matter and a complete investigation of the walls will be made. It is stated by those who have visited the house that there no indication of trickery practiced in the matter.

Knocked His Eye Out.

"I'll knock your eye out!" angrily yelled Albert F. Ellis to young Harry Walstein yesterday and he did.

Walstein, who lives at 261 East Fourth street, delivered a parcel at 1391 First avenue, where Ellis, seventeen years old, is the elevator boy. They quarreled and Ellis knocked out Walstein's eye. It fell on the pavement and smashed.

"I didn't know it was a glass eye or I'd have hit him in the other," said Ellis, apologetically in the Harlem Police Court. Magistrate Cornell held him in $300 bail.—New York World.

FIRST GUN OF CIVIL WAR

Georgia Controlled Available Supply Of Ammunition.

Gen. John Battle Erwin, of South Carolina, tells this story of the manner in which the Confederate Government procured the shot and powder with which Fort Sumter was bombarded.

"I got this story direct from Bob Toombs," said General Erwin. "You will recall that he was in the first Confederate Cabinet as Secretary of State. When he resigned and took the field I was on his staff.

"At the beginning of the Wilderness campaign he said to me one afternoon:

" 'Come, Erwin, I'm going over to see General Johnston. His wife and some of her young lady relatives are making him a visit and I'll take you along to entertain them.'

"As we rode along Toombs grow reminiscent. He described the many difficulties that had to be overcome in forming the Confederate Government and pointed out some of the mistakes that he thought had been made.

"The chief of these was, I remember, in not following the advice of 'Alec' Stephens, buying the cotton crop and shipping it abroad before the enemy had time to blockade our ports. From these subjects, which he spoke of with deep regret, his naturally buoyant temperament turned to the many little amusing incidents occurring at the time.

" 'Did you ever hear how we got the shot and shells that fired the first guns of this war?' he asked, and the recollection evidently amused him greatly. 'Of course the conditions in Charleston harbor were some of the first matters taken up by Mr. Davis and his Cabinet.

" 'At the time Montgomery was over run by unofficial delegates from Virginia and the other wavering States, all of them urging us to strike the fiast blow. "For," said they, "the moment war actually begins the waverers will join the seceders. We will rush the issue and force the State out of the Union into the Confederacy."

" 'As you know,' General Toombs continued, 'all the Cabinet were not in favor of our striking the first blow. We wanted Mr. Lincoln to be the aggressor. Finally, however, the bombardment of Sumter was decided on, and Walker, as Secretary of War, was instructed to telegraph General Beauregard to prepare for the attack.

"You know Walker. A good Alabama lawyer, but about the last man for a Cabinet position in a Government in its formative period. He sincrely believed that the sending of that telegram to Beauregard ended his connection with the affair. Beauregard's reply was short and to the point:

" '"Where is your shot? Where is your powder?" he asked.

" 'Walker rushed to the President in consternation. There wasn't time to send abroad and making ammunition ourselves was out of the question.

" 'Davis called a Cabinet meeting. Everybody had suggestions and the conference lasted far into the night. At last it was decided to ask Gov. Joseph E. Brown to turn over to the Confederate Government the shot and powder purchased in England for the defence of Georgea before the State joined the Confederacy.

" 'The telegram was sent, and we were not kept long waiting for Brown's reply. It was this:

" '"The Government of Georgia will turn over to the Government of the Confederate States of America the desired munitions of war provided the said Government will purchased the other supplies bought at the same time and for the same purpose—10,000 pairs of shoes, 10,000 pairs of blankets and 2 little gunboats now stationed at the mouth of the Savannah river—reimbursing the State of Georgia for the whole."

" 'The Secretary of War was in a rage. The President was nettled.

" '"Brown deserves to be impeached," Walker declared. "The idea of the Governor of a State presuming to dictate to the President of the Confederacy."

" 'Davis was more calm of speech and attributed the message to Joe Brown's ignorance of the situation and of the character of the Southern volunteer. Being a Georgian and knowing Governor Brown personally, it was decided that I shonld send him a telegram of remonstrance.

" 'I was to point out to him the improbability of there being a war. Even if our fire on Sumpter was resented by the North their resistance could not be long. But even in case of war the Confederate Government could not possible make use of the supplies he offered, as our troops were made up of Southern gentlemen, who preferred to furnish their own equipment and would never wear Government supplies.

" 'Knowing Joe Brown, I was not surprised when his answer to my telegram arrived. This is what he said:

" '"The Governor of Georgia will turn over to the Government of the Confederate States of America the desired munitions of war provided the said Government will purchase the other supplies brought at the same time and for the purpose—10,000 pairs of shoes, 10,000 pairs of blankets and 2 little gunboats now stationed at the mouth of the Savannah river—reimbursing the State of Georgia for the whole."

" 'What did we do?' Toombs chuckled. 'The only thing we could do. We bought Joe Brown munitions of war—10,000 pairs of shoes, 10,000 pairs of blankets and the 2 little gunboats stationed at the mouth of the Savannah.

" 'And do you know what Joe Brown did? He made the Confederate Government pay the State of Georgia cash, and in gold."

Wealth From Pacific Ocean.

Californians have solved the problem of the alchemists and are making gold out of sea water, says The Technical World Magazine. The Golden State has taken golden treasures out of her mountains, has made her valleys yield millions of dollars worth of golden fruit, has amassed tourist gold in exchange for her sunshine, and now turns to the great lazy Pacific and ransacks its coffers.

There is no rush of prospectors to the new field, however, as in the gold is coming out of the sea in the form of salts of potassium, magnesium and bromide, which would elude the pan and the rocker of the prospector.

Of several "diggings" of this nature, one at least is active and prosperous and one is approaching activity. The San Pedro Salt Company, which recently entered into the field, has succeeded in manufacturing a quantity and quality of salt which has found a ready market and has already assumed a place among the exports of the port of San Pedro. The fact that San Pedro is a lively and thriving port, with almost no outgoing cargoes, makes the development of this trade both easy and important. Since the first of last year the coasting schooners returning to the northern coast have taken away over a thousand tons of this sea salt.

STATUARY HALL IN THE CAPITOL

Undergoing Extensive Improvememt in Accord With Original Plan.

The work of restoring the interior of the United States Capitol building, even as to details, according to the original plan, has begun in earnest.

Visitors to the Capitol during the past few weeks have been greatly disappointed to find that all the statues in Statury Hall have been boxed, scaffolding erected over the entire space, and an army of expert workmen there and in other parts of the building making it most unattractive to sightseers.

Statuary Hall was originally intended to be left with a natural sandstone finish, but a good many years ago the architect of the Capitol ordered it decorated in imitation marble. Every vestige of the paint now on the walls, however, will be scraped off, and they will be left as at first intended. More than this, two of the old stairways which run from Statuaay Hall—which until 1859 was the hall of the House of Representatives—to what was formerly the men's gallery and the women's gallery, have been re-discovered and opened, and the men's gallery will also be restored to its original plan.

Congress at its last session appropriated the "restoration of the building." The reason this action was taken was because the restoring of the walls of the rotunda to their natural sandstone finish last year seems to have met with the nniversal approval by both Houses of Congress as well as by visitors to the Capitol. It is universally the opinion that the rotunda in its natural sandstone finish is far more beautiful and artistic than was the case when the handsome rosetinted sandstone was covered with a dozen layers of cracking paint.

When the now Statuary Hall was used as the House of Representatives it was conceded to be the most beautiful legislative hall in the world. It was purely Grecian in its decorations, the outline of the plan being a semicircle of ninety-six feet chord elongated in its vertical diametrical line by a parallelogram seventy-two feet long by twenty-five feet wide. The height to the top of the entablature blocking is thirty-five feet, and to the apex of the dome ceiling fifty-seven feet. So far as can be determined by sounding and testing, the entire wall space is of sandstone similar to that used in the construction of the rotunda. The circular colonade is made up of fourteen columns and two antes of the richest are composed of a remarkable beautiful species of variegated marble called Breccia, in solid blocks, obtained from the banks of the Potomac River, a hundred miles or so above Washington. This marble is of very remarkable formation, and the blocks being of a nature which made it impossible to have them turned on a lathe, as is ordinarily the case, were hand polished by slave labor. The capitals of these columns are of white Italian marble sculptured after a specimen taken from the temple of Jupiter Stator at Rome, the most admired specimen of capitals of this delicate and beautiful order. The entablature is after the proportions of that in the same temple, ornamented with dentils and medallions enriched between and underneath with leaves and roses. Over the colonade springs the magnificently painted paneled dome, whose friezes are familiar to every schoolboy in Washington.

The plans for restoring the building include the removel of the paint from all the pillars and crypt within it.

While the work of restoring the Capitol building to its former nature is a considerable undertaking, extra men have been employed in order that the scheme may be carried and completed early in May, owing to the fact that during the summer many of the visitors passing through Washington on their way to and from the Jamestown Expostion will naturally want to visit the national legislative halls.—Harper's Weekly.

HOW TO LOSE OR ACQUIRE FLESH

Investigation That Will Interest Those Who Are Too Thin or Too Fat.

There are too many fat people and too many thin people in the country, and the government, through the Agricultural Department, is conducting experiments to show them how to strikean average. F. F. Langworthy, chief of the division of nutrition investigation, is conducting inquiries which include dietary studies, digestive experiments and various other facts in connection with food.

"How to get thin and how to get fat" are being experimented with in a course of dietary studies at the University of Maine, at Orono, in that state, under the supervision of Professor C. D. Woods, and at the University of Tennessee, at Knoxville, by Professor E. C. Waite.

These experiments were in full swing before Secretary Taft entered the Cabinet, and therefore, writes the Washington correspondent of the New World, it cannot be changed even in a Presidential campaign that he used his influence to get the government to work on the proposition. "Now is the time to get thin," the government's experts believe. With the approach of the summer and its green vegetables the path of the fat man who wants to reduce is made easier.

To the fat man who wants to reduce the government says: "Eat little, sleep little and drink less."

To the thin man who is anxious to get out of the human skeleton class it says: "Drink all you can, eat all you can and sleep as much as you can."

The course prescribed for the fat man who wants to become thin is especially trying, for it means giving up the good things of life. He must not drink a drop of water or any other liquid one hour before eating nor until an hour has elapsed after he has finished. If he can make it two hours so much the better. Then his breakfast must consist of eggs, toast and coffee or cocoa, without sugar. His luncheon must be confined to a simple piece of meat or a cup of consomme or some fruit.

His dinner may consist of any kind of meat in any quantity and no vegetables other than tomatoes, spinach or cucumbers. He must eat no bread or butter. He may drink a cup of tea, but it must contain no sugar. He must eat nothing containing starch or sugar. He must eschew such foods as peas, beans, beets, potatoes, cauliflower, cabbage, parsnips and bananas. He can eat any kind of meat except veal. He must live mainly upon apples, oranges, grapes and other acid fruits and the three or four vegetables which tend to thin the blood. He must drink no milk and very little water. Alcoholic beverages of all sorts are barred. He may sip one glass of sour claret at dinner, but no more. The department experts say that after a month of such a course a fat man will be able to look at himself with pride.

The thin man who wants to get fat must eat and drink everything that he can stomach. He must eat plenty of potatoes, bananas and bread, and, most important, he, he must drink at, before and not after his meals. The experts say that, after all, it is principally what a person drinks, and not what he eats, that makes him fat. Fat is mostly water, it is asserted, and the more water or other liquids a person stows away the more like he to gain weigh. Sweets of all kinds are also urged as fat producers. Above all, a thin person who wants to spread out must sleep 10 or 11 hours a day. A nap after each meal is offered as an excellent inducement for fat to come and stay. On the other hand, the man who is trying to lose weight is advised that he keep moving after a meal to thwart the dread adipose.

"This the season of the year," said an Agricultural Department official, "when persons who are inconvenienced by fat may easily get rid of some of it. The heat of summer naturally tends to reduce the weigh, for it causes perspiration and that means the discharge of a deal of the water under the skin. But the principle inducement of summer is that the season offers many fresh vegetables, like tomatoes, onions, lettuce, radishes and the like, which the fat man may eat by the wholesale with impunity."

Patriotic Remnants.

THE evening of the Fourth has came,
But where is Willie's ear?
The one that's left looks quite the same.

But where is Willie's ear?
This morning when he went to play
With cannon crackers all the day
His lugs were twain. Now where, I pray,
Is Willie's other ear?

Upon the Fourth the sun has set,
But where is Albert's nose?
We've all our little darlings yet,
But where is Albert's nose?
When to the fray he went at morn
With matches, punk and powder horn
He'd all the things with which we're born—
Now where is Albert's nose?

The gloaming's started in to gloam,
But where is Charlie's leg?
The rest of Charles has all came home,
But where is Charlie's leg?
The man who drave the ambu-lance
Said laughingly, "No more he'll dance,
But 'twill be cheaper buying pance"—
Ah, where is Charlie's leg?

Thus every Fourth our darlings lose
Some features or a limb;
'Tis 'most enough to cause the blues
And make our lot seem grim.
But, many be their limbs or few
Compared with those that on them grew,
We'll shout for Yankee doodle do
From dawn till dusktide dim.

"Why, you took first prize at cooking school!"

"Yes, but I only studied the branches that taught how to get up a dainty luncheon from the cold meats and scraps of yesterday's dinner. Oh, I'll tell you! You go somewhere and get some scraps and I'll make the dearest croquettes you ever tasted."—Judge.

The Enormous Mud Tax.

In the course of a speech Congressman John H. Bankhead of Alabama declared that "the amount of money it takes to haul a ton five miles on our dirt roads will pay the freight for 250 miles on a railroad or 500 miles on a river and 1,000 miles on the lakes. These figures prove conclusively the enormous tax levied by the bad roads on the farmers and how much of their legitimate profit is consumed in hauling from the farms to the railroad stations, river landing and to the towns and cities. Not only have the farmers suffered great loss on account of poor roads, but the people in the towns and cities who depend upon them for their supplies have suffered also."

DEATH OF GEORGE A. FULLER.

Master of New York State Grange Expires Suddenly of Heart Disease.

A severe blow has fallen upon the New York state grange in the death of State Master George A. Fuller, which occurred at his home in Philadelphia, N. Y., on March 1. Death is believed to have been due to acute indigestion and its direct effect upon a heart weakness with which he had been troubled for some time.

Mr. Fuller was born on Edgewood farm, near Philadelphia, N. Y., on July 23, 1867. He received his education in the common schools, Ives seminary and the Potsdam Normal school. For two years after leaving the normal school he taught in the schools of northern New York. In 1888 he married Hattie May Randall of Black River, N. Y., and they have one son, Glenn L. Fuller. In 1888 Mr. Fuller's father died, and he assumed active management of Edgewood farm, which has since been his principal business. In 1891 Mr. Fuller joined Philadelphia grange, No. 114, and has served as its secretary, lecturer, overseer and master of Jefferson county Pomona grange and was overseer of New York state grange during 1900-1906. At the 1906 session of the New York state grange he was elected unanimously to the office of master.

Mr. Fuller was nominated for state treasurer by the Independence league last September and was assured of the nomination for the same office on the Democratic ticket, but, to his great honor, be it stated, he declined to accept the nomination in order that he might give his entire time and attention to the work of the grange.

George Fuller was every inch a man. His character was as sturdy as the oak, and his ideas of right and wrong were so immovably fixed that no man could question his integrity. With a broad knowledge of the needs and purposes of the grange, with a thorough consecration to the work which demanded so much of his time and attention, with a culture of mind, a kindliness of spirit and a genial and gentlemanly bearing, he was unusually well equipped for the honorable position which he held at the head of our Order in the state.

F. N. GODFREY.

F. N. Godfrey, overseer of the state grange, will succeed Mr. Fuller as state master for the balance of the term. Mr. Godfrey is a resident of Olean, N. Y., and a man thoroughly in sympathy with the policies which the late master has inaugurated.

A CO-OPERATIVE SCHEME.

How Maine Granges Propose to Get Better Prices For Farm Produce.

The co-operative committee of the Pomona granges of Maine is devising a plan for a system of marketing farm products whereby the commission men's profits may be saved to the producer. A system of storage houses is proposed which may be owned by one or more farmers, but each farmer is to keep his crops separate in the storage house, so that when sold he may get the benefit of his own labor. Thus apples carefully packed and graded need not help to sell another's apples carelessly packed and not graded.

The association thus handling thousands of bushels of fruit would be able to control the export trade in the state. It is understood that the farmer would be under no obligations to have his crop sold by the association, but would attend to it himself if he chose to, but all producers will be required to come up to the standard set by the association. If this plan of co-operative selling proves successful, it is likely to be adopted in other states. It will be watched with much interest.—Country Gentleman.

Governor Woodruff of Connecticut has recently joined the Order, taking the first two degrees at the capitol under the direction of State Master Wood and the final degrees at North Haven grange.

Dr. G. A. Bowen of Woodstock, Conn., was recently elected president of the State Patrons' Mutual Fire Insurance company.

MARYLAND AT JAMESTOWN.

The people of Maryland have reason to feel great pride and satisfaction in the part that their State has been taking in the opening days of the Jamestown Exposition. It is the historic note that characterizes that Exposition, and Maryland's participation has been fully in keeping with that note. The State building is of a beautiful colonial design, being modeled after a house built by Charles Carroll of Carrolton, and the main hall in it is a replica of the Senate chamber in the State House at Annapolis, in which Washington resigned his commission to the Congress of the United States then assembled in that chamber. In this hall have been collected a remarkable group of historical documents and portraits, of great patriotic interest; and among them is included, as Captain Colston stated in his address of presentation to the Governor, the letter written by General Washington to the Governor of Maryland announcing the surrender at Yorktown. Governor Warfield, in his speech accepting the building, did well to recall to memory the remarkable and pregnant history of the relation between Maryland and and Virginia, and especially of the transaction between them at the Revolutionary War, which may well claim to have been the germ of the Constitution of the United States, and thus to have been a vital cause of the transformation of a mere confederation of States into a national Union. Such historic memories are an ever-living fountain of true patriotism. The Governor, in his speech, did not fail to pay a graceful and well-deserved tribute to the ladies to whose energetic and well-directed efforts the character of the Maryland Building as to its interior arrangement and its historic collections, is mainly due. That Maryland would show up at Jamestown as she should was to be expected, but it is a pleasure to realize that in this case the expected has happened.

UP TO OHIO.

The well informed Washington correspondent of the New York World points out some of the inner significance of the Foraker opposition to Taft in Ohio. It is not merely the outcome of Foraker's personal antipathy to Roosevelt and his dislike of the Roosevelt political theories. The fire-alarm senator is not jumping into this fight simply to get even for the Hepburn bill and the Brownsville affair. Just as he used every endeavor to discredit the administration in the senate and before the country by trying to thwart effective railroad legislation, and by making a salutary measure of military discipline a matter of legislative inquiry, so he is now working with deliberate purpose in Ohio to accomplish the defeat of Rooseveltism.

Whatever may have been the basis of fact for that $5,000,000 conspiracy story, told by a drunken senator at a Washington dinner table, there is no room to doubt the plain fact that exceedingly powerful financial interests earnestly desire the nomination of some man on whom they can depend to give a check to the Roosevelt program of corporate control. These interests have unlimited resources at command in the way of money. Their resources are manipulated by men of the Harriman type who do not hesitate to boast of their readiness and their power to control legislation by corrupt methods. These men know, too, that another four years of the square deal regime means the uncovering of a lot of crooked work, with the possibility of a forced disgorgement of ill-gotten gains.

The task they have set for themselves is to bring about the nomination of a reactionary republican, and the first step in that direction is to beat Taft in Ohio. If they can accomplish that first step, the allied interests have hopes of being able to prevent the nomination of any straight-out Roosevelt republican. They would not hope to nominate Foraker, and the plan appears to be concentrated on Fairbanks, but a Taft victory in Ohio would mean that reactionism was hopelessly knocked out in the very first round.

Hence it is that the Foraker-Taft campaign has a significance of national importance. It is up to the Ohio people to decide whether or not the reactionaries are to cut any figure in the republican national convention. Reports appearing in West Virginia papers published along the Ohio indicate that the people on the other bank of the river are for Taft in the proportion of about nine to one, while the politicians are inclined to be non-committal. The men who have been used to run with the old machine are loth to leave it, but this machine will run up on rough going when the people find out that its real purpose is to take them out of the Roosevelt camp.

Foraker stands for a continuation of the conditions which have made the Standard Oil system and Harrimanism possible. Taft stands for a continuation of the campaign for the control of public service corporations. The more clearly this contrast is made to stand out in the canvass for the primary, the more overwhelming will become the sentiment for the nomination of Taft. It will take that $5,000,000, and then some, to fool the people of Ohio on the proposition of turning down a reactionary.

The Big Holler.

Once a certain Genius who thought that the Moon was inhabited proposed that at a certain moment on a certain night every man, woman and child on earth should holler just as loud as possible, so that the Man in the Moon might hear the sound and know that he had neighbors.

Everybody said it was a Fine Idea. Everybody agreed to Holler with a big H. For a month in advance everybody practiced lung exercises, so as to cultivate the Biggest Holler possible. Everybody was sure that the Moon Man couldn't help but hear the Vast Volume of Vociferation.

The Eventful Night arrived. The Moon Man was looking down through a cloudless sky. Everybody on earth drew in two large lungfuls of air and got ready for the Big Holler. The Mighty Moment came at last!!!

Silence! Absolute silence! It was the silentest moment since the morning stars first sang together.

When the returns came in it was known that only one man, a negro in Darkest Africa, hollered, and one woman in Oshkosh, Wis., who was so excited that she just couldn't help it, let out a faint hysterical shriek.

Everybody else had kept Mum in order to hear the Big Holler that all the others were going to make.

But nobody made the holler because they all waited for the other fellows to do it—all except the African, who had no curiosity, and the Oshkosh lady, who had hysterics.

And the Man in the Moon just laughed!

It was enough to make a comet splutter, for it revealed a very amusing trait in human nature.

You will find lots of people right here in this community who refuse to join in the Big Holler because they want to get the full benefit of the holler when the other people make it. Sometimes by making a Big Holler all at once we might get a new factory located here, but when 999 men stand around, each waiting for all the others to do the hollering, and only one man hollers, the man looking for a factory site doesn't hear any sound.

If it takes a Big Holler to get what we want, every fellow must lend a lung.

This is not just a funny story. It is Full of Philosophy. It ought to set you thinking.

MORAL: Now's the time for the Big Holler!

BITTINGER.

Farmers are busy this week preparing the ground for oats and potato seeding. Other evidences of spring are seen on every hand.

Jonas Bittinger recently sold a valuable horse to Daniel Baker.

'Squire Wade H. Loar, of Swanton, spent last Sunday night and part of Monday with his brother Jefferson near here.

Harvey Spiker, of Accident, passed through this village last Monday.

Prof. Loraditch, of Oakland, stopped over night in this village last week while en route to Grantsville where he will instruct a class in manual training.

Miss Elizabeth Welch was visiting Miss Amanda Ellithorp last week.

Henry Wilt, who has resided near here for a number of years, will move his family to Jennings this week.

Messrs. Mahlon Warnick and Floyd Stark, of Jennings, were treating some of Bittinger's pretty girls to a buggy ride Sunday afternoon.

Mr. and Mrs. T. B. Wiley were shopping in Oakland last Saturday, returning home on Sunday.

Webster Deitriech, the little five year old son of Mr. and Mrs. Dennis Deitriech, strayed away from his home last Saturday afternoon and became lost and when found he was about four miles from his home, and it is said that the little fellow had trudged over more than twice that distance in his wanderings. A small yellow dog which attended the child all the afternoon until found has become the hero of the hour.

Misses Mary Buckle and Effie Bittinger were shopping in Grantsville last Saturday.

Gone Into the Mercantile Business.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MISS HELEN LAUGHLIN.

At seven-fifteen o'clock this morning after days of weary suffering, the soul of Helen Laughlin, the thirteen year old daughter of Mr. Hice R. Laughlin, chief train despatcher for the B. & O. in this city, entered into rest eternal, the end coming peacefully. Helen had been ill for more than three weeks past with typhoid fever, and her condition was extremely critical from the first. For several days the patient lay at death's door, with little or no hope of her recovery, but a few days ago there was a surprising turn for the better, and the hopes of her father and other relatives ran high and recovery was being predicted. Yesterday afternoon the patient's heart took a bad turn, and despite the strenuous efforts of the attending physicians the little girl continued to sink until death came as noted. She was conscious from the time her heart failed her to the end. The remains were removed from the Sanitarium today to the Laughlin residence on Yates avenue, from where the funeral will occur at an hour to be named later. Mr. Laughlin's first wife, and mother of Helen, was Miss Annie Flanagan, daughter of Mrs Mike Flanagan of Wilford street, and the mother died when Helen was but six months of age. The baby girl was then taken by her grandparents, Dr. and Mrs. Laughlin of Mt. Lake Park, and by them tenderly reared. She was never of robust health, and when attacked by the fever her relatives and friends were fearful from the first. She was a bright and charming little girl and was dearly loved by all who had ever come into contact with her. She was the idol of her father's heart and also idolized by her grandparents and their families on both sides.—Saturday's Grafton Sentinel.

MRS. HENRY MYERS.

Died, on the morning of May 1st, 1907, at her home near Oakland, of asthma, with which she suffered many years, Mrs. Henry Myers, aged more than seventy years. The deceased lady was born near New Germany, this county, being a daughter of the late Henry Durst, who went west many years ago, dying in Preston, Minn., about 1896. In the year 1859 she was married to Mr. Myers, who survives her. She was the mother of nine children, seven of whom are still living. Mrs. Myers was raised in this county where she has a large circle of relatives and friends. She was a member of the Lutheran church for many years. Her funeral will take place tomorrow morning from her late home and the interment will be made in the cemetery on the farm. The husband and children of the deceased lady have the sincere sympathy of their friends in their sad bereavement.

A Curiosity.

A natual curiosity of more than ordinary interest was found a few days ago by a lumberman employed by A. Knabb & Co. on a tract of timber land in Preston county, W. Va., near the village of Clifton Mills.

While working in a swampy section of land the woodsmen came upon an old log which by mere accident they found to be completely petrified The log was gotten out, crated and hauled to the railroad at Somerfield and shipped to A. Knabb & Co. at Chester, Pa., who, it is reported, will forward it to the West Virginia department at the Jamestown Exposition. The log is a most wonderful fossil for this section, being about five feet long and from two to two and a half feet in diameter. The weight is estimated by those who handled it to be from 1,000 to 1,200 pounds. The ax marks on the smaller end and a larger chip cut from the side can be plainly seen.

A New Orleans woman was thin.
Because she did not extract sufficient nourishment from her food.
She took Scott's Emulsion.

He Was a Mail Order Chap.

A young man who does not believe in patronizing home industries, recently sent to Sears, Roebuck & Co., for a pair of trousers. In the pocket of the pants he found the following note:

"Should this fall into the hands of a good-looking young man who desires to correspond with a lady of sweet disposition, kindly address,"——

The aforesaid mail order "mutt" sent a letter to the address, and in a few days received the following reply:

"Sir, my wife has just received a letter from you, addressed in her maiden name. Fifteen years ago, when she worked in a sweat shop, she might have written the note. She is now the mother of six children, and is my lawful wife. If yon don't cut out writing to her, I will take a trip to your town and make you look like two cents worth of dog meat."

Will Operate Timber Tract.

Messrs. Austin Brown, of Oakland, and Albert Frazee, of Selbysport, have contracted with Messrs. DuBois & [illegible] Bros., of Bond, to cut and deliver to the railroad operated by the latter corporation, a large body of timber lying in the neighborhood of Merrill, in District No. 11 of this county. The tract comprises several hundred [illegible] and is covered with hard [illegible] woods. Messrs. Brown and Fra[illegible] already purchased a mill of ten thousand feet capacity which will be received on Monday of next week from the manufacturers, when they will begin work erecting it preparatory to cutting the timber.

To place your umbrella in a rack indicates that it is about to change owners; an umbrella carried over a woman the man getting nothing but the drippings of the rain, signifies courtship; when the man has the umbrella and the woman the drippings, it indicates marriage; to carry it at an angle under the arm siginfies that an eye is to be lost by the man who follows you; to put a cotton umbrella by the side of a silk one means "exchange is no robbery;" to lend an umbrella may be interpreted, "I am a fool;" to carry an umbrella just high enough to tear out men's eyes and knock off men's hats signifies, "I am a woman."

Rev. and Mrs. John A. McClelland left Oakland yesterday afternoon on train No. 55 for Grafton, W. Va., where Rev. McClelland will serve the Presbyterian congregation as pastor. Their departure from Oakland is regretted by many warm friends here, whose well wishes follow them to their new home. Mrs. Randall, the mother of Mrs. McClelland, will remain here a few days before joining her kindred at Grafton.

A rather peculiar incident happened at Keyser, W. Va., court during the past week. The case of the State vs. Martin Blizzard was being tried before a jury and after the case was given to the jury, that body returned with a verdict against James Abogast, the principal witness in the case. Upon being informed by the court that they were not trying Mr. Abogast they retired to the jury room and returned with a verdict against the prisoner, Martin Blizzard.

Mr. and Mrs. L. T. Yoder, of Pittsburg, who are summer residents of Mountain Lake Park, were in Oakland last Saturday morning, having arrived here from Deer Park where they had been for a day or two inspecting the farm and buildings belonging to Mr. John W. Williams, which was sold at public auction in Pittsburg on Tuesday of this week. Quite a number of other persons from Pittsburg, Philadelphia and Washington inspected the farm with the intention of bidding on it. Who the purchaser was we have been unable to learn.

Fairmont is in the midst of a great religious revival. It needs it. The business houses, even the saloons, which are usually classed as the foes of religion, close one hour a day to permit their employes to go to church. If they succeed in driving Satan out of Fairmont the old fellow will lose one of his strongest fortifications in his earthly battlefield. But he cannot be greatly disconcerted so long as he keeps his clutches on Clarksburg.—Morgantown Chronicle. Or Grafton, or Morgantown.

Running a newspaper is just like running a hotel, only different. When a man goes into a hotel and finds some thing on the table which does not suit him, he does not raise hades with the landlord and tell him to stop his old hotel. Well hardly. He sets that dish to one side and wades into the many dishes that suit him. It is different with some newspaper readers. They find an article occasionally that does not suit them exactly and without stopping to think it may please hundreds of other readers, make a grand stand play and tell the editor how a paper should be run and what should be put into it. But such people are becoming fewer every year.

THE GARRETT COUNTY FAIR.

Church Entertainment will Be Given in the Opera House Tuesday Night.

The local talent entertainment, the Garrett County Fair, to be given in the Opera House May 7th, for the benefit of the Episcopal church, will be the finest and most interesting entertainment ever given in Oakland. This will be a real County Fair with pumpkins, potatoes and cabbage on display and real bicycle races, horse races and pig races. Plenty of fakirs will be there with their gold bricks and side shows. A real wild man and fat lady. In fact there will be attractions finer and greater than anything ever before seen in Garrett County. Advertisements have been sent into all neighboring towns and counties and it is likely there will be an unusual crowd in attendance. At any rate Jake Sprucely and his wife have sent word they will be on hand and as they are related to half the people of Garrett county, the Sprucely family will likely have a reunion right in the fair grounds. Parson Briggs will be out to look after his flock and keep them from the temptations which are bound to lie in their paths on an occasion of this kind.

Progress in Garrett County For Fine Stock.

Garrett county has the honor of having some of the finest Scotch topped and Cruikshank short horns in the state. Mr. Jerry Yost, of Grantsville, Md., has lately purchased a very fine young bull of H. S. Yoder, Grantsville, Md., for $90, 16 months old, weight 1020 pounds, being the first calf of 3rd maid of Roselawn Vol. 63 "a grand daughter of Cordelia of Roselawn Vol. 43, first prize winning cow for three years at the Hagerstown fair." Her sire and grand sire were both great bulls of superior quality weighing 2700 and 2800 pounds respectively. This calf is a get of Royal Master No. 223693 a Scotch topped young Mary, not only making him one of the finest bred bulls, but is equally merited as a magnificent individual. The above named cows stand as the foundation of a new herd of short horns in Garrett county, owned by H. S. Yoder, who as a result has raised some very fine young stock, of which the above named purchased bull is one. Mr. Yost is a young man of good judgment and knows a good thing when he sees it. Success to him.—Meyersdale Commercial.

FIKE.

The farmers of this place were progressing slowly the last week with their spring work for the weather is still inclement.

John S. Fike, wife and mother were pleasant callers at Isaiah Umbel's on Sunday last

Mrs. Frank Brandt died at her home just across the line in Pennsylvania on April 21, 1907, and was buried the next day in the M. N. Thomas cemetery near Markleysburg, Pa. The funeral was preached in Pleasant View church by by Rev. Jeremiah Thomas.

Robert Fike, son of Andrew J. Fike, died at his home near Tissue, Pa., on April 23, 1907. The funeral was preached on the following day by Rev. George W. Van Sickle, and interment was also made in the M. N. Thomas cemetery.

Benjamin Fike and wife, of Glady, W. Va., have been here the past week visiting relatives.

Lloyd K. Fike made a trip to Friendsville last week, and spent part of the day in the normal school of that place. He reports that there is a good school being taught there and about 50 students were in attendance at that time.

The mail carrier from Fike to Fearer says that the Government will have to furnish a larger mail bag as the one he his will not hold the mail.

Owen Evans and Isaiah Umbel, two of our farmers, are hauling lime from the railroad for their spring crops, the lime being purchased from C. J. Yoder, of near Grantsville, Md.

Mrs. Wm. H. Thomas is making good progress hatching chickens. She set one hen twice and has seven chickens for her trouble.

This place has lost another of its pretty girls by marriage. Miss Mary Fike was married April 24, 1907, to Mr. Lee Lowman, of Kendall.

Wm. H. Thomas made a business trip to Markleysburg, Pa , last Saturday.

Mrs. Mary J. Thomas, of Somerfield, Pa., was visiting friends in this vicinity last week.

Mr. Alex T. Fike, the oldest man in our section, was 78 years old an April 24, 1907, and he works every day. Does not walk with a cane, nor wear glasses. He does his own house work and works out considerable.

Governor Fleming to Rebuild.

Ex-Governor A. B. Fleming of West Virginia, whose beautiful home, "Oak Hall," located midway between Oakland and Mt. Lake Park, was destroyed by fire last fall just as the Governor and Mrs. Fleming were preparing to move to their winter house at Fairmont, W. Va., states he is having plans drawn for a new summer home on the old site, and a little farther back from the roadway. The new home will be an up-to-date summer home and will far eclipse the former residence in architecture and arrangement. The grounds surrounding it are now being greatly beautified by his neighbor, Mr. L. L. Lantz, and the work of constructing the new home will be commenced soon.

Just received at A. D. Naylor & Co.'s, one car of Granulated Lime; one car of Fertilizer for Potatoes, Oats and Corn; one car of two and three-ply and granite Roofing, and a big lot of Building Paper, Roof Coating, etc., etc. Special low prices for the next ten days. 3t

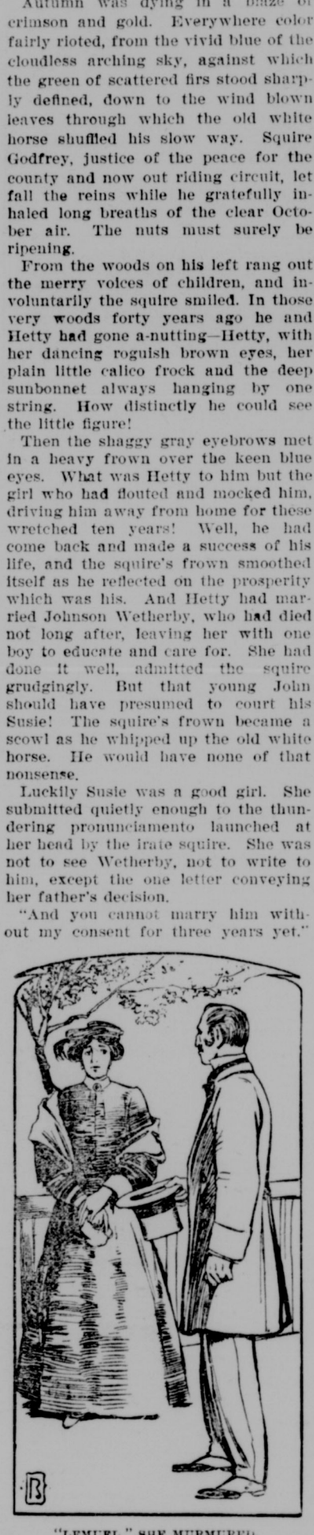
Autumn was dying in a blaze of crimson and gold. Everywhere color fairly rioted, from the vivid blue of the cloudless arching sky, against which the green of scattered firs stood sharply defined, down to the wind blown leaves through which the old white horse shuffled his slow way. Squire Godfrey, justice of the peace for the county and now out riding circuit, let fall the reins while he gratefully inhaled long breaths of the clear October air. The nuts must surely be ripening.

From the woods on his left rang out the merry voices of children, and involuntarily the squire smiled. In those very woods forty years ago he and Hetty had gone a-nutting—Hetty, with her dancing roguish brown eyes, her plain little calico frock and the deep sunbonnet always hanging by one string. How distinctly he could see the little figure!

Then the shaggy gray eyebrows met in a heavy frown over the keen blue eyes. What was Hetty to him but the girl who had flouted and mocked him, driving him away from home for these wretched ten years! Well, he had come back and made a success of his life, and the squire's frown smoothed itself as he reflected on the prosperity which was his. And Hetty had married Johnson Wetherby, who had died not long after, leaving her with one boy to educate and care for. She had done it well, admitted the squire grudgingly. But that young John should have presumed to court his Susie! The squire's frown became a scowl as he whipped up the old white horse. He would have none of that nonsense.

Luckily Susie was a good girl. She submitted quietly enough to the thundering pronunciamento launched at her head by the irate squire. She was not to see Wetherby, not to write to him, except the one letter conveying her father's decision.

"And you cannot marry him without my consent for three years yet."



"LEMUEL," SHE MURMURED.

chuckled the squire, "for I won't sign the license. Of course if you choose to run off to some other county"—

But Susie shook her head. No, she would not do that.

It was well that he had been so firm, pursued the squire. He had been proved in the right, for it was a year now since Susie had even mentioned John's name. She was cured, just as he predicted she would be; otherwise he would scarcely have felt safe leaving her in charge of the office, according to former custom. But he could trust Susie; she was his own child. Perhaps the squire overlooked the fact that he himself had not yet forgotten.

As he drew up at the little inn which was to be his first halting place the man was surprised to see a familiar looking buggy already fastened in the trim wooden shed. The tavern was a quaint, homely building, white and square, with tall pillars and green shutters. At the rear ran a wide, sunny veranda. The squire, going through the dark, chilly hallway, pushed open the the swing door. Then he stopped short. Facing him rose a slim, white faced little woman clad in dusty black bombazine. The worn hands, tightly clasped together, shook a bit, but the brown eyes met his own with the old dauntless look.

"Lemuel," she murmured.

"Hetty," responded the squire, bewilderedly breaking the silence of thirty years.

A sudden appeal flashed up into the thin face. Her fingers strained themselves desperately in their cotton gloves.

"Lemuel," she began again, "I—I want to speak to you—I've wanted to for a long time, but you wouldn't let me. Then John told me that you would probably stop here today"—

"Ah, yes, John," said the squire in an altered tone. "For the moment I had forgotten John. It is to him, then, that I am indebted for this pleasure," his stubborn mouth wrinkling into a sudden sarcasm.

Mrs. Wetherby regarded him with a level glance.

"Yes, it is John," she said steadily. "For my own sake I should never have pleaded. That you chose to take as serious a bit of girlish folly, a childish pique which one kind word from you would have melted, for all that—let it go. The past is past. But John, my boy—must his life, too, be spoiled? He loves your daughter. She loves him," unheeding the squire's angry flush. "Must they lose their youth and let life's sweetest years be sacrificed merely to satisfy a dislike of me, Lemuel?" A passionate energy inspired her eager words.

"Dislike," repeated the squire thoughtfully. "Dislike. Was it really that?" Whatever his faults, the squire was truthful. "But, Hetty," a sudden warmth breaking into his own voice, "Hetty, you said—you said 'spoiled too.' Do you mean that you cared? Did you, Hetty?" with compelling eyes on hers.

"Yes," said Mrs. Wetherby simply. "I cared. And you went away, you never wrote, and so—at last—I married Johnson Wetherby. He was a good husband." A sudden impulse of loyalty toward the dead surged within her.

"And I married Susan Martin," mused the squire aloud, but he was conscious of what he was saying. A great wonder held him fast. Was this the quiet, self repressed woman who all these years had sat across the aisle from him every Sunday morning in church, this slender, vibrant creature, trembling in the might of her demand for happiness of her son? Was this the woman whom he had believed without feeling? In a sudden flash of insight he caught himself, a man cherishing the hidden resentment which year by year hardened character and face, while she— A tender reverence slowly crept into the stern old eyes.

"Come," he said gently, "we'll have some dinner, and then we can talk about John."

When, a week later, the squire's buggy pulled up before the honeysuckle laden porch of home, the owner's brows were drawn together into a semblance of its former frown. The mouth held its accustomed lines. Only in the deep set blue eyes a new light gleamed irrepressibly. But Susie did not see. The girl came slowly to the door. Close behind followed a tall, slim young fellow with steady brown eyes. The squire stared.

"Father," announced Susie, pale, but resolute, "I want to tell you at once that I'm married to John. The blank licenses for any one needing them were on your desk already signed. It was only necessary to fill in the names. I—I hope you forgive me. But if you don't," as her father still stared with features unrelaxed, "I'm ready to go. I couldn't leave the house alone, though. And, besides, I wanted to tell you myself. We were married this morning." The squire's own defiant will beamed from her blue eyes. She was his own child, all right, the squire recognized, with an amused recollection of his former thought, and he could hardly sue himself for issuing a license to a minor without her parent's consent, his own name being signed to the document.

The squire threw down his reins.

"Well," he capitulated, "if it's done, it's done. And we were planning to give you such a fine wedding too!" Then as an amazed "we" broke from the startled girl Squire Godfrey leaned over and patted the curly head.

"I'm not going to scold," he declared heartily. "Fact is, I'm married myself. My wife's waiting now at the hotel for you to come; said I must tell you myself first. So run and get on your hat, John," while a long, searching look passed between the two men as their hands met, "you've got to be doubly a son to me now. Your mother has taken me at last."

Revenge Is Sweet.

In ordinary life he was a very important person, for he was a judge; but, alas, his liver got out of order just the same as if he had been an ordinary mortal, and a brother luminary had advised him to take a Turkish bath. It was a luxury he had not previously indulged in, and he noticed that the rubber was terribly rough. However, he patiently endured being punched, slapped and poked until he could stand the torture no longer.

"Is—it—qui-te—neces-sary—to—ma-ke—me—black—and—blue—all—over?" panted his lordship.

"Never you mind; you're all right," responded the rubber, redoubling his energy and grinning diabolically.

"Who (slap, groan) are (thud, groan) you?" gasped the judge, a horrible suspicion dawning in his mind. "Your (whack, groan) face does (whack, groan) look fa—(groan) look fa—(groan) miliar" (swish, groan).

"Oh, you remember me, do you?" growled the rubber sarcastically. "Well, mebbe you'd like to have the chance to send me up for six months again for prize fighting—whoosh."—Pearson's Weekly.

Humors of Sculpture.

"When architects insist on decorating the facades of public buildings with symbolical groups," remarked a New York philosopher, "they often add unconsciously to the humor of everyday life. Just look at those two cherubs over the central window on top of the hall of records, for example. How can any one with a memory ever forget the scandals of the construction of that building in looking at these two figures? One of them is plainly going over the account books of the cost, while the other one is peering downward, as if he were trying to get a glimpse of that imitation marble work that has been put up on the walls of the upper stories. And the best of it is that such stories last. Who ever went to Washington for the first time that he did not have to listen to that yarn about the statue of Columbus or Washington or some one else that stands in front of the capitol, throwing the ball up to the Goddess of Liberty on the dome?"—New York Press.

THAT SKINNER BOY.

A Music Dealer Trusts Innocent Youngster With a Banjo.

WAS TO DELIVER INSTRUMENT

But It Fails to Reach Its Destination Owing to a Row In Street Car as to Whether Banjo Was an Infernal Machine or Not.

[Copyright, 1907, by E. C. Parcells.]

Humpy Skinner was on his way home from school the other day, with his usual innocent look on his face, and he was passing a music store when the dealer came to the door and said:

"Sonny, you look to me like an innocent boy."

"Yes, sir, I am," was the reply.

"I think you are a boy that can be trusted."

"I know I am."

"Well, a man left a banjo here last week to be repaired. It's all ready to go home, but I have no one to send with it. If I should give it into your hands and promise you a quarter for taking it to 232 Harrison street, I believe you would do the errand all right."

"HELLO, BUB! THAT'S A QUEER KIND OF HATBOX."

"I surely would, sir."

"Very well. You had better go up to Ninth street and take the crosstown car. Here is the banjo in its box, and when you return you shall have the quarter."

Humpy started off in the highest spirits. He had gone only a block when he met that Thomas boy and was saluted with:

"Hello, Hump! What you got there?"

"A banjo."

"It hain't yours?"

"Nope. I'm taking it up on Harrison street for a music man."

"And he trusted you with a banjo, did he?"

"Yep. He said I looked innocent and honest."

Going to the Top Fast.

"Well, I never! Say, Hump, I don't want to make you vain, but can you find anywhere in American history that George Washington was trusted with a banjo belonging to some one else? No, sir, you can't. You are going right up to the top as fast as you can go, and I predict that they'll have your picture in the papers in less 'n six months."

The boy and the banjo had gone a block farther when they encountered a street car conductor off duty and leaning up against a wall on the corner. He had had two or three drinks to keep the bears off and was feeling good.

"Hello, bub! That's a queer sort of hatbox!" he said as he reached out for Humpy.

"It hain't no hatbox; it's a banjo in there," was the reply.

"Is that so? Say, now, but I used to beat the band playing on a banjo. Once when I played to a crowd over a hundred strong men broke down and wept. I'll give you a tune."

"But you can't. The man told me not to open the case."

"Never mind what the man told you, sonny. I'm running this old car this trip. I'll have you dancing before I have played a dozen notes of 'Yankee Doodle.'"

Humpy protested and hung on to the box, but it would have been wrested from him except that a policeman saw the squabble from afar and came hastening up the street.

"Oh, well, he can go on with his old banjo," said the conductor as he released his hold on the box. "All I wanted was to play a few tunes and liven up the old town a bit, but I'll go inside and take two more drinks instead."

Obeys Officer's Command.

The officer told Humpy to hump himself along, and his command was obeyed. He reached Ninth street without further adventure and boarded a car, but he was scarcely seated when a woman beside him looked him over very sharply and said:

"Boy, did the conductor take notice of that box when you got on?"

"Yes'm. He asked me if I had a cat in it, and I told him no."

"I hope you didn't lie to him. I was on a street car once when a cat got out of a basket and clawed my face, and I have never got over the scare. If you are carrying a cat"—

"It's a banjo, ma'am," explained Humpy.

"I am glad to hear that, and I hope you haven't lied to me. The box may explode anyhow, and I wish you would go farther up the car. I was on a car once when a banjo or something else in a box exploded, and I had my eyeglasses blown off."

Humpy moved to the front of the car and sat down beside a man who had been nodding with sleep. The banjo box happened to hit his knee, and he aroused and looked around and demanded to know who had kicked him. Then his eyes fell upon Humpy and the box, and he said:

"Boy, I don't like it at all. I believe you are an anarchist and making ready to blow up this car."

"Banjos don't explode, do they?" asked Humpy, with a smile.

"A banjo, eh? And what are you doing with a banjo?"

"Taking it up to a man on Harrison street."

May Have Been Infernal Machine.

"Um! It may be a banjo, and it may be an infernal machine. In these days we can't be too careful. A grocer asked me to open a can of chicken the other day, but I was too sharp for him. When another fellow tried it, it exploded and blew his arm off. We will look at that supposed banjo."

"But I was told not to open the box," protested Humpy.

"Makes no difference, sonny. As a freeborn American citizen I've got a right to know whether I'm riding with dynamite or musical instruments. Open up!"

"I shan't do it. It's a banjo, and you can believe me or not."

"The plot thickens," whispered the man as he assumed a knowing look. And of a sudden he grabbed the box and threw up the cover. Then an oldish man who had been reading a paper laid it aside and said:

"I don't know why you couldn't have taken the boy's word."

"I trust no one," replied the other. "Rockefeller, Rogers and the rest of us can't tell what minute we must confront danger. It seems to be a banjo, but is it one? Has it got dynamite concealed in its stomach? Are we about to be greeted with the strains of 'Old Dan Tucker,' or are we to be hurled into eternity without a moment's preparation?"

"You talk like a fool! Give the boy the box and stop fooling."

"Oh, I talk like a fool, do I? Say, now, you are an older man than I am, and you are baldheaded and bow legged, but you must apologize or there'll be a row here."

Men Began Scrapping.

"You go to with your apologies!"

Then the two men rose up and began scrapping. Humpy tried to get the banjo box, but it went down on the floor between them and was stepped on. The conductor came running, two of the men passengers mixed in, and five or six women set up a screaming. The row was over in five minutes, and when Humpy could make out the banjo he saw only a few strings and splinters of wood.

"W-what am I going to do?" he asked of the conductor, who had had his nose skinned in the fracas.

"Was it your banjo?"

"No. I was taking it somewhere for a music dealer."

"My son, you look innocent and lamblike."

"And I am."

"There is no banjo; there is no box. As there is no banjo and no box, there can be no delivery. It isn't your fault. It is what they call an act of providence, and no one is responsible. Just drop off the car as easy as you can and take that innocent and lamblike face of yours home. If your dear mother wants to know why you are pale faced and shaky in the knees, tell her an auto cut off your coattails. See?"

M. QUAD.

No Room For Expansion.

Prospective Tenant—Rent this flat? Why, no one but a narrow minded person would rent such a flat as this!

The Janitor—Faith, mum, it wouldn't even accommodate a mind unless it was narrow.—Pittsburg Post.

Some Difference.

"Did I understand you to say that my appearance has improved?"

"No; I said you looked more like yourself."—New York Life.

Optimistic.

Professor—What a good thing I had my field glasses with me today. It shortens distances tremendously.—Pele Mele.

So He Doesn't.

If I meant what I said
When I happen to speak,
They would think me a freak
And not right in my head.
I'd be blamed to as great
Or a greater extent
And arouse as much hate
If I said what I meant.

If I said what I meant,
All my friends I would lose.
If that course I should choose,
I would surely repent.
I would have to be dumb
Or considered ill bred
By acquaintance and chum
If I meant what I said.

It is sad, I must say,
But it never would do.
Speech can never be trife
In a literal way.
My approach you would dread;
That is quite evident,
If I meant what I said.
If I said what I meant.

The Railroads' Duty to the Public.

By HOKE SMITH, Governor of Georgia.

LEFT without restraint the railroad companies can fix the value of lands. They can determine the profits of merchants. They can control the business of the manufacturer. THEY CAN MAKE AND UNMAKE TOWNS AND CITIES. The condition of dependence by the public upon them increases from day to day. A few years ago the transportation companies were controlled by many and varied interests. Now they are largely consolidated, and several interests control nearly three-fourths of the entire railroad mileage of the United States.

The control of the railroads of the country has passed from trained railroad operators TO BANKERS who speculate in railroad stocks. A notable result of this condition is the withdrawal of authority from the local management and local superintendence, the reduction of salaries to those ACTUALLY DOING THE WORK of transportation and the dwarfing of the power and capacity of the men upon whose management the public must immediately depend. To this, at least in part, is due the recent tendency toward a less efficient service.

The interests controlling the railroads, as a rule, study the problem of making IMMENSE FORTUNES at once out of increased stock and bond issues. The right to earn a just income on the actual investment in the properties does not interest them. They are careless of the duties owed by transportation companies to the public.

The public must look to the states and to the nation to protect their rights. When we realize that over half the stocks and bonds issued by the railroad companies of the United States are speculative AND NOT BASED UPON MONEY ACTUALLY INVESTED in the properties, we see how recklessly the rights of the public have been disregarded. I present no struggle of labor against capital. I urge no contest of poverty against property. I plead for the rights of the property owners and their employees of the United States, of the men owning industrial and manufacturing enterprises, of the men owning agricultural interests and of the great body of the people DEPENDENT UPON THEIR EFFORTS.

I PLEAD FOR THE LEGITIMATE RIGHTS OF THE PUBLIC AGAINST THE MISMANAGEMENT OF QUASI PUBLIC CORPORATIONS.

Instead of exhausting the capacity of our transportation companies to pay dividends on WATERED STOCK and bonds the public was entitled to have all the money realized from the sale of stocks and bonds invested in the properties. Thereby the facilities of the transportation companies should have been improved. The public was furthermore entitled to a reduction in transportation charges as the volume of business increased and the COST OF SERVICE LESSENED.

Transportation companies should not be permitted to load down their properties with stocks and bonds for SPECULATIVE purposes. The railroad commission should have the fullest power to COMPEL proper facilities to be furnished.

ANY EFFORT BY RAILROAD COMPANIES TO RETALIATE WITH A REDUCTION OF SERVICE OR BY CUTTING PAY OF EMPLOYEES SHOULD BE MET BY SEVERE PERSONAL PUNISHMENT TO THE GUILTY OFFICERS. STATE COMMISSIONS SHOULD BE EMPOWERED WITH FULL AUTHORITY IN MATTERS OF INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION.

Shall the People Rule Or Shall They Be Ruled?

By Colonel G. B. M. HARVEY, Journalist and Public Speaker.

ONE OVERPOWERING question now confronts the American people, Shall they rule themselves or SHALL THEY BE RULED? Shall their sovereignty continue to be popular, however inadequate, or become paternal, HOWEVER BENEFICIAL? Shall it be a government of the people or by the people, a government based upon principle or a government relying upon EXPEDIENCY? The founders of the republic believed they had settled this question for all time when they conceived the idea of withholding from the national government the exercise of all functions NOT SPECIFICALLY CONCEDED BY THE PEOPLE and the states, and it was in conformity with that decision that Washington put aside the proffered crown—the symbol of centralized authority—and Massachusetts wrote into her organic law those memorable words:

"TO THE END THAT THIS MAY BE A GOVERNMENT OF LAWS AND NOT OF MEN."

Upon that rock the fathers builded the constitution of the United States, jealously safeguarding PERSONAL LIBERTY, guaranteeing to life and property the protection of self government, giving first consideration to true interpretation of written law, maintaining the rightful force of precedent and tradition, leaving the correction of temporary evils to NATURAL REMEDIES, reposing faith in the ability of each community to solve its own problems and regarding no question as settled UNTIL SETTLED RIGHT.

The results that have ensued, even to the excessive prosperity of which, happily, we are now able to COMPLAIN, would seem to prove the wisdom of the conclusion reached by those elder statesmen. And yet we are told by those now in executive authority that the time has come when the great body of citizens, convinced of the ESSENTIAL INADEQUACY OF THAT ORIGINAL POLICY to meet the requirements of new conditions, demand that the pendulum be swung back and that the federal government be vested with plenary power.

When You Need Printing Done

You want it to be of the very best kind. As you expect your printed matter to make business it is necessary it should do the talking for you. Poor or indifferent printing cannot do this as it lacks the strong points required to gain and hold the interest of the patron.

BOWSER ACTS GENTLE

Refuses to Be Disturbed by Things as of Old.

NOT A KICK OR COMPLAINT.

Wife Apprehensive That He May Be Coming Down With Measles or Whooping Cough — He Astonishes Many Others.

[Copyright, 1907, by P. C. Eastment.]

When Mr. Bowser left home for the office the other morning, he was talking about the world turning on its axis every twenty-four hours and the matter being one worthy of investigation, and all day long Mrs. Bowser was worried over what he might do that evening to prove that the world did or did not turn. She remembered his buying new milk cows, Leghorn chickens, slabsided pigs, burglar alarms, balloons and fire escapes, and she was prepared for the worst when he came home at night. She half expected that his first words would tell her that he was going to start a frog farm, but one look into his face delighted her. Mr. Bowser was calm. He was composed. He was dignified. It was clear that he wasn't going to try any gas saving invention or make an experiment with the water pipes.

Throughout the dinner his talk was quiet and without enthusiasm. She threw out a hint about the world turning on its axis, but he did not rise to it. He didn't seem to care a red cent whether the old world turned or stood still. She expected him to break out as soon as dinner was finished and they had returned to the sitting room, but he sat him down like any dignified citizen and lighted his cigar and took up the evening paper. After a few minutes there was a ring at the front door, and he answered it in person. It was a tramp who had called to ask for money.

IT WAS A TRAMP WHO HAD CALLED TO ASK FOR MONEY.

Unusual Calm.

Ninety-nine times out of a hundred Mr. Bowser would have blasted that tramp's eyes for coming to the front door. Then he would have yelled at him. Then he would have rushed him down the steps and out of the yard. Mrs. Bowser waited in vain for sounds of conflict. In a quiet and dignified way Mr. Bowser informed the caller that there was a charities' lodging house two blocks away and advised him to walk down there. He was not even red in the face when he returned to his chair. Only five minutes later the woman next door began singing and playing the piano. The singing was harsh and the playing harsher. Only a week before when the nuisance had struck up Mr. Bowser had walked up and down the room making all sorts of threats. He had even asked where the crowbar was and vowed he would go in and smash that piano to splinters.

Mrs. Bowser expected another scene, but none came. Mr. Bowser continued to be serene. He didn't even try to remember whether the old ax was down cellar or out in the shed. The cook in the kitchen said that murder must surely follow such sounds, but she listened and listened and heard no stir. When the woman next door had tired herself out, Mrs. Bowser observed:

"It seems to me that such things should be forbidden by law."

"But if she calls it playing and singing we must put up with it," replied Mr. Bowser, with a smile.

Then the front bell rang again. He went to the door to find three men, and one of them explained that they were a committee from the Ninth ward to offer Mr. Bowser the nomination for the aldermanship. Previous committees when this sort of job had been put up had been invited into the library and tendered wine and cigars, but this one did not get beyond the front hall. The callers were quietly but firmly informed by Mr. Bowser that he had no further aspirations for political honors and must decline their offer. They hinted that they would like to talk things over while drinking a bottle of claret, but he excused himself on the ground of business and worked them out.

"Why didn't you accept the nomination?" asked Mrs. Bowser when he returned.

"I prefer a quiet life and my own home," he replied.

Not a month before he had expressed his desire to run for mayor and had said that his home was the worst run establishment in America. When she had observed that a committee was seeking to "work" him, he had walked up and down and shouted and charged her with being the most suspicious and distrustful person he had ever heard of.

Says He'll Consult Wife.

A week before, unknown to his wife, Mr. Bowser had looked at a secondhand auto that was for sale and encouraged the owner to think he would become the purchaser. The man had got tired of waiting and had come around on this particular evening to see whether the sale was off or on. He rang the bell in an aggressive way, and when it was answered he said:

"Well, Bowser, about that auto—do you want it or not?"

"I haven't consulted my wife yet."

Mrs. Bowser overheard the words, and, as he had never consulted her in his life about the buying or selling of anything, she at once developed palpitation of the heart.

"What's your wife got to do with it?" demanded the man.

"A good deal, sir. I shouldn't think of buying such a thing unless she was satisfied. I think, to cut the matter short and not bother you further, that I will wait another year before investing."

The man muttered a "Humph!" and departed without a good night, but Mr. Bowser was still serene when he returned to his chair. A few minutes later Mrs. Bowser remembered that she wanted something from the drug store and that the coffee was out. He volunteered to do both errands. On other occasions he had spent half an hour to read her a lesson on shiftlessness, but he left the house this time without a word. As a general thing, on entering the store of his family druggist he has remarks to make about the drug trust, the adulteration of medicines, the highway robbery of prices and the number of people poisoned every year by leather headed retail druggists. In return and to get even the druggist has something to say about cranks and husbands whose wives know more than they do and folks meddling with other folks' business.

Surprises Druggist.

On this occasion, however, Mr. Bowser quietly entered the store, made a remark on the weather and asked for what he wanted and got out. The druggist was loaded for bear, but he didn't have to shoot. He simply turned to a customer after Mr. Bowser had disappeared and said:

"That change in a man always comes about a month before his death. I shall be sorry to see that man laid away."

Mr. Bowser was told before he left the house that the order for the coffee had been given at noon and neglected. He had taken his trade away from three different grocers for a like neglect, and he had threatened this one. When the grocer saw him come in, he turned as pale as death and got ready to lie about a wheel coming off his wagon, but the next minute an awful load was lifted from his shoulders when Bowser smiled and said:

"Brown, I think you forgot our coffee. Rushed with business, of course, and you can be excused, and, being I'm here, I'll take it along."

The grocer offered to send two boys and two wagons with the two pounds of mocha, he offered to go himself, he offered to add a jar of jam to make up for his neglect, but Mr. Bowser quietly smiled and took the package under his arm.

"Did you rip him up the back, as you call it?" asked Mrs. Bowser as she saw the coffee.

"Brown is a very busy man these days," was the reply.

"But are you going to trade there any longer?"

"Why, of course. There isn't a grocer in the world that doesn't skip an order now and then."

"Did the druggist say anything mean to you?"

"No, dear."

"Didn't he order you out of the store?"

"For what reason? The druggist and I are very good friends indeed."

For the next hour Mrs. Bowser sat in a puzzle—not a kick or complaint or shout or yell. When bedtime came, all was still serene. Mr. Bowser fell asleep like a young child, and she still wondered and puzzled and peered at him and said to herself:

"He looks like Mr. Bowser, he certainly is Mr. Bowser, but I can't make this out unless he's coming down with the measles or whooping cough."

The Club Joker.

Joker—Have you heard the story of the bed?

Victim—No.

Joker—There you lie!—Tatler.

Missed Her.

"How is your afternoon bridge club coming on?"

"Oh, very poorly. Dear Mrs. Gabber has left us."

"But I thought she was an atrocious player?"

"Yes, she is. But, then, she always had so many delicious stories to tell about her neighbors."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

SOLDIER GAVE HIS LIFE FOR SISTER OF CHARITY

Stopped Speeding Bullet Intended for Sister Paula, Who is an Oakland Lady

A news dispatch from Washington under date of the 6th inst., gives an account of a double tragedy enacted at the Soldiers' Home near the National Capital on Monday of this week, in which Miss Julia Stanton, of Oakland, who is known under her religious name as Sister Paula, was the intended victim of the murderer but whose life was saved only by an act of Providence and the substitution of another as a buffet for the bullet intended for her.

The account taken from the Baltimore Sun of Tuesday portraying the details of the tragedy is as follows:

"Stepping deliberately in the path of a bullet intended for Sister Paula, of the hospital connected with the Soldiers' Home, James L. Leslie, orderly in the hospital, was fatally shot about noon today by William Parks, 47 years old, who until last night was also an inmate of the home. Parks then shot and killed himself Leslie died at 3.30 p. m.

"Parks had been employed at the dining room at the home. He drank heavily for several days last week, and on account of this was relieved from duty and assigned as orderly in the hospital. He continued his drinking, and Superintendent William Grant dismissed him from the home, the order to take effect this morning. He was still suffering from the effects of liquor when he left for town, where he purchased a 38-calibre revolver. Returning to the home, he went at once to the hospital ward, where he had been employed, and was ordered out by Sister Paula. He drew his revolver and aimed at the Sister, when Leslie stepped in front of her. Parks fired, the bullet striking Leslie and passing through one of his shoulders. Leslie grabbed Parks, who then shot him through the back. As Leslie dropped to the floor Parks placed the weapon against his own breast and fired. He died instantly.

"While Leslie was struggling with Parks a blind inmate of the home grappled with the would-be murderer, but could not subdue him.

"Leslie was 36 yesrs old.

"Both men were honorably discharged soldiers of the regular army. Leslie's last service was with the One Hundred and Fifteenth Company, Coast Artillery, and he was a native of Chicago. Parks served with Company D, Fifth Artillery, and was a native of Zanesville, Ohio.

"At the hospital it is believed that Parks, while drink crazed, planned to kill someone whom he thought had reported his drinking to the superintendent and caused his dismissal."

Sister Paula is the youngest sister of Rev. Thomas J Stanton, pastor of St. Joseph's church in Baltimore, and Mr. Jerry M. Stanton, of Oakland, and has been in charge of the ward in the National Soldiers' Home hospital for a year or more.

MAY WEATHER.

Peter R. Smith Says the Month Will Have Changeable Temperature.

May is likely to be attended by vigorous rain waves. Hail in a number of localities and much electricity in the atmosphere will be developed during showers. Storms of wind will be a feature of disturbance in the west and southwest. The temperature before each rain will become warm, then following the rain it will reach the frost line in many places. May will have a very changing temperature through the month.

About the close of April the temperature will become warm and spread over western sections, and later in the east, then followed by showers of rain which will be attended by electricity and vigorous wind in many sections. In eastern parts these showers will close about the 2d or 3d and be followed by a very cool wave, which will reach the frost line in a number of localities about the 3d or 4th.

This period of showers will be central about the 6th or 7th which may be prolonged in rain and cloudiness to the 9th or 10th, or even to the next period, which will be central on or touching the 13th and will be denoted by very warm currents of air from the south. This wave may prove to be very intense in many sections—mostly in the west and south west. After the rainstorm has passed on east a very cool wave will follow on about the 15th, reaching the frost line.

On the 18th and 29th changes to warmer will denote storm conditions. Cloudiness will ensue and air currents shift to the south and east. Showers attended by electricity and wind will be on transit and followed by a cool wave.

The storm period running from the 22d to the 25th will reach its development on the 23d or 24th.

The last period of the month will reach its crisis on about the 28th. Storms of wind in many localities are probable

Married

SMITH—WONDERLY—Mr. John Warden Smith and Miss Mary Wonderly, of Oakland, were quietly married at the home of Mrs. Nancy Smith, the mother of the groom, last Sunday morning, May 5th. The ceremony was performed by Rev. C. W. Hudson, pastor of the Deer Park Baptist church. After a wedding dinner the happy couple left for their future home in Blaine, W. Va., accompanied by the well wishes of their friends.

COURT HOUSE CONTRACT TO BE AWARDED MONDAY

Commission Undecided Concerning Material To Be Used In Building.

The Court House Commission of Garrett county with all members of the body present with the exception of Associate Judge Martin L. Keedy, who was detained at Cumberland where he was holding court, and Mr. John W. McCullough, of Friendsville, who was unable to attend on account of private business affairs, met in Oakland last Saturday.

The object of the meeting of the Commission was to award the contract for the erection of the proposed new Court House for Garrett county in accordance with the advertisement for bids which has been published in THE REPUBLICAN for a number of weeks, the intention of the Commission having been to make the award on April 18th, but by request of the contractors who had made an exhaustive study of the original plans adopted by the Commission, the time was extended until last Saturday, the 4th inst., when the bids sent the Commission by mail and also those tendered it by the contractors personally were opened, but the award was deferred until Monday of next week so as to give the Commission ample opportunity to determine what kind of material shall be used in the construction of the building.

To secure the best building for the purposes for which this one is intended, the Commission very wisely requested bidders to submit their figures for constructing it of solid brick without stone ornamentation of any kind; of pressed brick with and without stone trimmings; of stone composing the basement or executive story and the superstructure of pressed brick with stone trimmings, and also for the entire building of stone, the brick in every case to be of the first quality, and the stone to be what is commonly known as Indiana limestone, which enters largely into the construction of almost every modern public building, it being deemed the best material obtainable for the purpose.

As a result of the Commission's invitation for bids covering the several kinds of materials thirteen bids were filed with the Commission, ranging in price from $43,000 for the cheapest, or common brick, construction, to about $83,000 for the building composed entirely of stone.

The Commission generally, so it is understood, is in favor of using the combination brick and stone construction, that is: the first, or executive story of the building erected of the Indiana limestone and the second story of a light colored pressed brick with stone trimmings.

On the above class of building there were several bids submitted, ranging from $57,000 to $68,000, Mr. W. A. Liller, of Keyser, being the lowest bidder. His closest competitor was Fissell & Wagner, a New York firm, whose price was $64,000, others who exceeded these bids being the Brady Construction Company, of Clarksburg, West Va.; Elliott & Winchell, of Wheeling, West Va., and another New York firm whose name could not be learned.

Messrs. A. D. Naylor & Co., the Oakland heating and lighting engineers, submitted to the Commission a bid for the plumbing, heating, electric wiring and gas fitting required by the plans.

As above stated, the Commission will again meet on Monday next when the contract will in all probability be awarded either to Mr. Liller or to his next lowest competitor.

Red Men to Celebrate.

The Improved Order of Red Men of Youghiogheny Tribe No. 151, of Mountain Lake Park, will celebrate Saint Taminas Day at the Mountain Lake Park Methodist Episcopal church on Sunday evening, May 12th, at eight o'clock. ## THE COUNTY FAIR SCORES BIG HIT IN OAKLAND

Home Talent Gave the Most Enjoyable Entertainment in Many Years.

The Opera House was crowded Tuesday night to witness "The County Fair" as presented by ninety of Oakland's young people. It was a pronounced success and was given without a jar or hitch from beginning to end, and moreover, was easily one of the best rendered and most enjoyable entertainments in the theatrical line ever attempted here by home talent. This is the more remarkable when it is remembered that those taking part in the play were not only amateurs, but had only one full rehearsal. The admirable manner of the entire presentation, therefore, reflects the highest credit on our home talent and on the skill of those directing it.

The familliar scenes at a county fair were given with a fidelity to detail that was much appreciated by the audience and many of them were very laughable; and if the balloon ascension and horse racing could not be seen, they could easily be imagined.

The "Widow Smithers," who has buried four husbands and is willing, if not anxious, to make a fifth matrimonial venture, is the central figure, so to speak, in the play. This character was taken by Miss Mary Miller and was as clever a piece of work as one would expect from a professional.

The specialties were most enjoyable and nearly all of them were encored. The music was beautiful and exceptionally well sung, while the drills and various movements of the young people were given with much grace and precision. Undoubtenly the musical features of the play were the most appreciated, judging from the volume of applause with which they were received.

In such a large cast as this was, and where all did so admirably, individual mention is impossible in a limited space; but suffice it to say that Oakland demonstrated Tuesday night that she has plenty of the best sort of amateur talent—and not all of it was on the stage Tuesday night, either—and the wonder is that we don't have more entertainments along this line. If a "County Fair" can be gotten up in less than a week what might be done in a month by the talented young people of town?

The play concluded with a catchy song and very pretty drill entitled "Grand Old Flag," with Mr. Max Jarboe as soloist.

The cast of characters and those taking part in the play was asfollows:

The affair was given under the aupices of the Guild and for the benefit of St. Matthew's Protestant Episcopal church, netting the sum of $73.

FIKE.

The farmers here are preparing the soil for sowing oats and planting corn. There are some few that have their oats sowed.

We have some very industrious people here, for they work all night or at least they make a noise so that their near neighbors can't sleep.

Mr. Joseph Bowser and wife were callers at Wm. H. Thomas' on the 28th of April.

William Brumbaugh, of Western Pennsylvania, passed through this place a few days ago, stopping at W. H. Thomas' for a couple of days.

Geo. Vansickle, of West Virginia, was shooting stumps out with dynamite for Isaiah Umble one day last week.

Wm. R. Barnthouse was a pleasant caller at L. K. Fike's one day last week.

Mrs. Mary Lowman intends going next Sunday to her brother-in-law, where she will spend a couple of weeks, and she will then go to Crellin where her husband is employed by the Kendall Company.

It appears that Lloyd K. Fike has something very attractive of Fearer, for he makes a visit to that section every week.

Geo. E. Wass, of near Addison, Pa., passed through here with a drove of of cattle taking them to pasture in the glades of Pennsylvania. While passing this week with his cattle he took dinner with Hanison Thomas.

Wm. H. Thomas made a trip to Friendsville last week bringing back with him one hundred bottles of Porter's Pain King for the Pain King man, Mr. E. E. Paugh.

Thomas Hinebaugh sold his store to Neal Friend, and Jasper Fike, one of the teachers of Fike, Md., is helping to invoice the the goods.

W. H. Thomas is doing some grafting for Levi Fike, of Fearer.

James Frantz and wife were shopping at Fike one day last week.

Coal Lasts Longer.

George Frey, of Hancock, who has operated a shoemaker's bench there for half a century, has long been using a liquid that he puts on coal to make it last at least one-third longer than ordinarily. He soaks his leather in a tub draws the acids out of the leather, making it the color of wood ash lye. The liquid he sprinkles on his coal with satisfactory results.

JURORS FOR JUNE TERM OF THE CIRCUIT COURT

Today is Ascension Day.

Today is Ascension Day, or Holy Thursday. It is celebrated on the fortieth day after Easter, in honor of the ascension of the Messiah into Heaven 40 days after his resurrection. It is one of the oldest festivals of the church. St. Augustine in his day said that it had been kept from time immemorial. He attributed its institution to the Apostles. In olden times a procession used to be held on Ascension Day in memory of that which the apostles made from Jerusalem to Bethany and the Mount of Olives. It was also the custom in ancient days to bless the bread and new fruits in the mass.

Cash or Trade for Produce.

Garthright, Mountain Lake Park, will pay highest market price, either in cash or trade for Butter, Eggs and Potatoes. Want five hundred bushels Potatoes at once.

Jock's Li'l' Boy.

By FRANK H. SWEET.

Copyright, 1906, by Frank H. Sweet.

"I CAN'T let you off now, Jock," I expostulated impatiently. "These lines must be run by Saturday, and you're the best chopper I have. Can't you wait till next week?"

Jock looked down at me a little reproachfully, I thought.

"I's 'bleeged to go, boss," he said decisively. "I done tole yo' my li'l' boy's wuss. Mar'get's Tobe jes' fotched me de news. I'd like pow'ful to he'p yo' all, but I jes' cayn', don' yo' see?"

"Very well," I answered irritably as I opened my pocketbook and began to count out the money due him, "only don't come whining around after more work. I can't be forever taking on new hands and teaching them the ropes. I want men who will stand by me."

I spoke rather more vehemently than I meant to, but I liked Jock and was very unwilling to have him go. He had been with me only a few weeks, but was already worth any two men I had. Considerably over six feet in height and strong and massive in proportion, he was at once fertile in expedients and perfectly obedient to orders.

I was thinking regretfully of Jock's departure as I turned my instrument around and sighted back over the line. Everything was all right, and I signaled the rear man to come forward. As I took out my field book to make some notes I was conscious of a light touch on my shoulder.

"What—not gone yet?" I asked.

"No, boss. I cayn' go disaway. If I ain' come back no mo' I don' wan' yo' t'ink ob me as no 'count nigger. I jes' 'bleeged to go."

"Oh, that's all right," I answered, a little ashamed of my ill temper. "You needn't mind what I said about not coming back. I was out of sorts. If I have a place, I shall be glad to take you on any time."

The black face cleared instantly.

"T'ank yo', boss! T'ank yo', sah! I like yo' alls wuk. Yo'se de bes' boss I's had, 'cep'n' de doctor."

I slipped the field book into my pocket and sat down upon a stump.

"Who is this doctor you are forever talking about, Jock?" I asked. "I am getting curious about him."

Jock's face became grave once more. I fancied I could see tears glistening in his eyes.

"He's de bes' man dat eber lib, sah—de berry bes' man de good Gawd ever made. I been his body sarbent for ten year an' wuk for him an' watch ober him an' nuss him. I watch him so I almost know w'at he t'ink 'bout. He didn' hab no fo'ks nowhars, an' he ustar say dat I war his'n's fambly. He tuk me in de wood w'en he hunt bugs an' t'ings, an' he tuk me in de city w'en he wuk for de pore fo'ks."

"How came you to leave him?"

"I didn't leave him, sah; he done lef' me. De good Gawd tuk him. W'en de yaller fever brok out, he wuk night an' day, lak he allers do. Mos' ebery-body git outen de city, but de pore fo'ks had to stay, an' de doctor an' nu'ses hatter stay to look after 'em. Dr. Halton stan' it for seben week; den he tuk de fever an' die."

"Dr. Halton!" I exclaimed. "That name sounds familiar."

"Co'se it do, sah. De papers was full ob it. De doctor was a rich man, an' he done gib bofe his life an' money to de cause. I reckon de whole world done hern 'bout him. He wuk night an' day, all de time, an' nebber t'ought ob res'."

"And you remained with him through it all?" I asked.

"Oh co'se!" Jock answered simply. "De doctor 'lowed I was good he'p. I was big an' strong an' could wuk roun' an' lif' de sick fo'ks."

"And you didn't catch the fever?"

"No, sah!" showing his teeth a little. "I reckon dis nigger's skin too t'ick for fever git fru. W'en de doctor die I had no wuk, so I nuss roun' till de winter come an' brek de fever. Den I pick up all de doctor's t'ings. Yo' see," his voice growing low and tremulous, "de doctor done tole me sell eberyt'ing he hab lef' an' buy me a li'l' home somewhar. I git fo' hun'erd dollars an come up disaway. Yo' know?"

I nodded. I had often seen and admired Jock's little vine covered cottage and wondered at his exquisite taste in shrubs and flowers. On one occasion I had met him walking back and forth, crooning some strange African melody to a pitiful mite of humanity in his arms. Perhaps this was the "li'l' boy" he was so fond of.

"How old is your little boy?" I asked.

"Dunno, sah. Reckon he's a heap ol'er 'n his size on 'count o' bein' twisted. Yo' see, boss, it didn' 'pear jes' right for me to use de doctor's money for myse'f. Seemed lak it orter go to de pore fo'ks, lak de res' ob his fortune. But dar war de orders. So I buys de house an' den hunts roun' an' fin's de skimpines' bit ob pickaninny I kin—one dat ain't de leastes' able to keer for himse'f—an' sets out to raise him. My ole mammy come lib wid me an' look arter t'ings. Den ebery summer I goes down to de city an' brings up a whole passle ob young uns outen de street an' gibs 'em a good time. Dar's plenty ob melyuns an' sweet taters an' gyarden truck roun' my place, an' I takes 'em out huntin' an' fishin'. I 'lows dey done enj'y it from de way dey pr'jec' roun'." Jock threw back his head and laughed heartily at the recollection of some of their projecting. Then he suddenly became grave. "Does yo' know, boss," he continued solemnly, "it 'pears mighty strange to me sometimes, lak as ef de Lawd's han' war in it? Dat pore li'l' pickaninny w'at I 'low to be de runties' in de whole worl' is tu'nin' out to be sompin stronery. He c'n play de fiddle lak a born musicianer, an' for de banjo an' flute, laws, it brings out de tears jes' ter lis'n. Does yo' know, boss," abruptly, "w'at I's wukin' up hyer for?"

"To earn some money, I suppose," I answered, laughing.

"Dat's hit prezac'ly. But I ain' need no money for housekeepin'. I raise gyarden truck an' chickens an' t'ings, an' I go fishin' an' huntin'. No, sah! I's gittin' money for dat li'l' boy's musicianin'. He's plumb 'stracted 'bout an orgin. I's been totin' him up to Mis' Hun'erford's lately so't he mout lis'n to her playin', an' fer a fac', sah, dat li'l' boy'd jes' cock his head on one side while she played a chune, den he'd climb up on dat stool an' play de same chune frou, ebery dot an' skiver prezac'. Mis' Hun'erford say 'twar truly 'stonishin'. Yes, sah, dat boy's gwyne hab an orgin, an' I'm gwine hab him learn play jes' lak white fo'ks, off'n paper."

At this moment the rear man came up and stood waiting for orders. Jock ducked his head and was turning away when I called him back. Unclasping the glittering chain from my watch, I handed it to him.

"Give it to the little boy," I said, "and tell him it is from one of his daddy's friends."

Jock's face grew fairly radiant. A present for himself would not have given him half the pleasure.

The next week my chief sent instructions for me to repair to Terrebonne and survey some swamp land. I had been there before and knew the place well. In winter it would not have been so bad, but now! I crushed the brief note impatiently in my hand.

But there was no help for it, so we set about breaking camp. The next day we were ready for departure.

As we stood on the platform of the little way station waiting for the train I saw the big, well known figure of Jock hurrying up the track. In a few minutes he was beside me.

"'Clar' for it, boss, I war feared I wouldn't ketch up," he panted. "I's mos' run de bref outen me."

I welcomed him heartily. His broad shoulders and knowledge of woodcraft would be invaluable in that out of the way place. The terms of his service were quickly arranged, and then I asked him about the little boy.

"I dunno for shore, yet, sah," he said gravely. "De doctor 'low he war in a bad fix an' better be sent up norf to a gran' hospital. He 'low de boy cayn' nebber be 'aised lak he is, but dat mebbe de big doctors mout unwin' de twistes an' fix him up lak udder boys. Ef dey do dat," with a rare smile, "I'll sho t'ank de good Gawd all de res' ob my life."

"It will be very expensive," I ventured.

"Yes, sah; so de doctor tole me. He 'low he'd ax Judge Hun'erford to he'p some, but I done stop dat," throwing his head back proudly. "I don' ax no he'p long's I c'n he'p myse'f. De li'l' boy's mine, an' I's de one to tak car' ob him.' Then, with a light quaver in his voice, he added abruptly, "I done sol' de house an' pigs an' t'ings."

"Why, that's too bad!" I exclaimed involuntarily. "Wasn't there any other way."

"No, sah, an' de house an' t'ings didn' fetch quite enuf. De li'l' boy'll hatter be t'ree mos' a year, an' doctor's stuff an' nussin' cos' a heap. I done hire a room for my ole mammy an' will sen' her sompin' ebery mont'. All de res' nuss' go to de hospital. I 'splained it to de doctor an' 'lowed he'd fix it all right."

"So you have already sent the boy?"

"Yes, sah; de doctor done sent a nuss wid him yes'day."

It was night when we reached Thibodeau. The money we purchased provisions and set out for the scene of our labors. Three months later I received instructions to cross over into Texas. It was spring before we returned to Florida.

One day Jock burst into my tent with an open letter in his hand.

"He's done cured," he cried radiantly. "All de twistes an' disjints tuk outer him! He's a-comin' home now, walkin' from de cyars lak udder boys. Glory to de Lam'! But scuse me, boss," lowering his voice suddenly. "I's tickled clean fru. I reckon yo'll hatter lemme off a few days, sah. I mus' see dat li'l' boy."

"Of course! But will you come back?"

"Suttin'ly, sah. I mus' wuk right peart now an' mek heaps ob money. Dar's dat boy's orgin, an' dar's dat home I'm a-gwyne to buy back. Yes, sah, I'll mos' shorely come back."

A week later he returned, bringing a basket of fresh lettuce and radishes as a welcome addition to our camp table.

"How about the boy?" I asked.

Jock's face shone, and yet under the joy I fancied I could detect a trace of uneasiness.

"He jes' de same lak udder boys now," he answered, "widout no misery nor crookedness to his walk an' only jes' pale an' skimpy from de hospital an' de pain. He say de doctor tell him to stay outdoor all dis summer an' wuk easy an' slow an' den he be purfec'ly well, an' den"— Jock broke off abruptly and busied himself for some minutes in sprinkling the green tops of his vegetables, then added, "I done hire de li'l' home back, an' my ole mammy an' de boy's dar now."

"HE'S DONE CURED!" HE CRIED RADIANTLY.

"That is fine!" I exclaimed in genuine pleasure. "With the boy's help you will soon be able to buy the place again."

Jock shook his head.

"I done gib dat all up now, boss," he said gravely. "Dar's mo' 'portant t'ings den jes' ownin' a house an' some grou'. I rent it dis summer on 'count de boy bein' outdoor an' likin' de place. But nex' fall my ole mammy say she start to take in washin', an' she an' me gwine wuk harder'n we eber done befo'. Dar'll be need for mo' money, an' she say she ain' too ole to he'p mak' it."

I suppose I looked puzzled, for Jock added quickly:

"It's de musicianin'. T'ings like dat when dey's plumb bilin' inside is 'bleeged to come out, I reckon. Dar was an orgin an' pianner bofe to de hospital, an' dat boy's fingers jes' nachally foun' de way to 'em. An' de fust time, I reckon, was 'fore he could walk, for I heered him tell my ole mammy dat de doctor lif' him off de stool an' tote him back to his baid. But de nex' day he crawl off dar ag'in some way, an' in de end de doctors hab to gib in. When he start home all cure up, dey tell him to wuk outdoor dis summer an' git strong an' den come back an' dey'll fix up 'bout his musicianin'." Jock drew himself to his full height with unconscious dignity as he added: "But de li'l' boy's mine, an' I's gwine fix up 'bout all dat. If he's stronery, lak de doctor say, I's de one to pay for all dat readin' off paper study, but if he wa'n' stronery it wouldn' mek no diff'runce. He wants it, an' I's boun' to get it for him."

"If he becomes a good musician, Jock," I ventured, "he will soon be able to do something for himself and perhaps to help you."

"He's a black boy," said Jock gravely. "'Cep'n' for dat he mout."

During the next two years I heard occasional reports of the boy's progress through Jock, and once I found an item in a newspaper about the part he took in a concert. This I gave to Jock, who hid it away among his other treasures. The third year we were down at the extreme end of Florida, working on the extension of a railroad to Key West. Jock had been with me all this time, untiring, devoted and, I might almost add, indispensable. One day he received a letter from his boy and brought it to me with an expression of mingled delight and incredulity.

"What yo' t'ink, boss," he said in an awed voice, "dat pickaninny's started out for hisse'f, an' he's done sen' me a check for six hun'erd dollar an' write dat it's for jes' fo' weeks' wuk playin' chunes. He say for me to buy de li'l' home back an' den me an' my ole mammy come an' lib 'long ob him an' hab eberyt'ing in dis wide worl' dat we want. He gwyne make money right along now."

"I told you"— I began, when Jock waved the unspoken words aside.

"'Pears lak dis am de doctor's money," he said, still in the awed voice, "an' it's for me to keep de money wukin'. I's gwyne take de six hun'erd an' hunt out mo' skimpy pickaninnies an' fotch dem up to de bes' t'ings de worl' hab to gib."

"But the house"—

"I's gwyne git dat, too," a little catch coming into his voice. "De boy ain' need my he'p no mo', an' I's too strong to gib up wuk yet an' res'. My ole mammy an' me gwyne wuk an' buy de li'l' home back now, an' den we bring mo' runty pickaninnies to lib 'long ob us. An' mebbe de boy'll come home to spen' his vacationin'. Glory to de Lam'!"

ANNUALLY.

A spade,
A hoe,
Some seeds
To sow
And catalogues galore,
A bit
Of soil,
Spare time
To toil—
The garden's made once more.
A flood,
A frost,
Too bad—
All lost!
Suburbanite is sore.
An oath,
A spade,
The beds
Remade
As nicely as before.
A boy,
A gate;
Sly chicks
In wait.
Then garden stuff from store.

One Personal Favor.

The late Thomas Nolan, a well known member of the bar of New York, was once retained as counsel for a poor widow named Mulcahy. She was suing a construction company for damages by reason of her husband's death. The case had been frequently postponed, and it was in a very disturbed state of mind that the widow sought the lawyer just before the suit came up for the eighth time. In court the next day Nolan's rich brogue was more than usually fervid as he fought against the further adjournment of the case. "I am sorry," said the justice presiding, "but, Mr. Nolan, your opponent has shown good cause for adjournment. The case will, therefore, go over till next week." "Very well, sor," said the lawyer sweetly, "but might I ask wan personal favor of this court?" "Certainly," replied the judge. "Will your honor kindly shtep down to my office and tell Mrs. Mulcahy that you have again adjourned the case?"—Bellman.

The "Professors."

A bandmaster tells of an incident that occurred during a country festival in the southwest. The advent of the famous band had been awaited with intense interest by the natives, and when the musicians arrived they were quickly surrounded by a surging crowd which hemmed them in so that it was difficult for them to proceed with their concert.

The bandmaster appealed to one of the committee to keep the crowd away, saying that unless his men had more room they could not play. The committeeman shook the musician's hand warmly, then, turning to the assembled multitude, he bawled out:

"Say, you uns step back and give the purfesser's purfessers a chanct to play!"—Youth's Companion.

Good Influence.

"Young men are very valuable in business," remarked the hustler.

"Yes," answered Mr. Rocks. "They inspire us older fellows with an ambition to really know as much as they think they know."

One Way of Escape.

"Life," remarked the pessimist, "is really not worth the living."

"If that's the way you feel about it," rejoined the optimist, "you should apply for a job as baseball umpire."—Chicago News.

No Lubrication.

"The oil trust is upsetting all natural precedent."

"In what way?"

"It can't smooth the rough waters in its sea of troubles."—Baltimore American.

Her Weak Point.

Mrs. Hoyle—Mrs. Royle is not a very entertaining talker.

Mrs. Doyle—No. You can't get her interested in other people's affairs.

Found Out.

I think that there's but little room
For doubt that they are bride and groom.

She looks at him with so much pride
It's certain she must be a bride.

And his adoring looks betray
His groomship—it's a give-away.

I notice, too, the lady's hat.
I'd want no better proof than that.

But, taken with that lilac dress,
It puts the matter past a guess.

Then he's so natty and so trim
There's not the least mistaking him.

Their baggage! See the silver tag
That gleams upon the lady's bag.

His suit case! I've seen very few
So very yellow, fresh and new.

No ordinary married man
Would carry one so spick and span.

And—did you see him look at her
As they approached the register?

Just wait a little while and see
When she puts sugar in his tea.

There! That should shake your unbelief;
He's just picked up her handkerchief.

And note her sudden carmine bloom!
You bet that they are bride and groom.

"High Finance" Is an Ancient Art.

By JAMES B. DILL, Judge of New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals and Authority on Corporation Law.

THE president of the United States in open warfare with the powers of corporate finance, charging that the FINANCIAL POWERS seek to obtain possession of state legislatures, of the national congress and of the judiciary, BY PURCHASE IF NECESSARY, is sufficient to make every citizen stop and ponder.

On the other hand, the position of the apostles of high finance when charged with corporate irregularities that "they move in a HIGHER WORLD into which we (the public) may not enter" is equally startling and calls for the consideration of thinking men.

High finance is not a modern institution, and the term "modern high finance" is a misnomer. Stock watering, withholding of dividends, diversion of capital, the making of false returns, HAVE BEEN KNOWN FOR CENTURIES.

Early in the first century certain gentlemen, imbued with a belief in "community of interests," entered into a pooling agreement, each contributing his property and each to draw his ratable interest.

This agreement they carried out faithfully with a single exception. One of the organizers, endeavoring to put a little water into his share of the enterprise to get for himself SOMETHING FOR NOTHING, sold his property, put a goodly portion of the proceeds in his own pocket and turned the balance into the treasury as the FULL consideration. A public investigation was forthwith ordered.

The original apostle of high finance was arrested, tried and convicted. He was not allowed to decline to answer under the advice of counsel, and therefore the case is reported in full IN TWENTY-ONE LINES. His accomplice, accorded a separate trial, was likewise promptly tried and convicted. For the record of an efficient investigation, a prompt trial, a just conviction and for a sound authority upon the subject of high finance the case of Ananias et Sapphira, reported in Acts v, is in point.

THE RECORD OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THIS ANCIENT INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE SHOULD BE INSTRUCTIVE TO THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION IN ITS INVESTIGATIONS.

In these days there is no doubt that some corporate financiers do attempt to ascend to a higher world into which the public may not enter, but there is a grave suspicion that the movement higher up is to get rid of OBSERVATION AND INQUIRY as to what is going on in the world of high finance.

IT IS OPENLY ASSERTED THAT THE FINANCIER TODAY WHO CLIMBS JACOB'S LADDER INTO THE CLOUDS DOES SO LESS WITH A VIEW OF COMMUNING WITH THE ANGELS THAN OF AVOIDING PUBLICITY.

Inconsistencies of International "Honors."

By ANDREW CARNEGIE.

THE growing perception of the INTERDEPENDENCE of the nations has brought clearly into view the question as to whether the world ought to permit international quarrels. Certainly a BETTER WAY ought to be found to settle those disputes.

It was said long ago on excellent authority that no man liveth unto himself. We have begun to perceive that NO NATION LIVETH UNTO ITSELF and that certainly no nation goeth to war unto itself. The government that decrees war is decreeing misery not only to its enemy and to its own citizens, but to thousands IN ALL OTHER COUNTRIES as well.

This is what the increasingly vexatious and involved questions as to the rights of neutrals, which form so important a part of the discussion of international conferences, mean. We are coming to understand that THE HUMAN RACE IS ONE. The interests of the army of English cotton spinners are at stake in a war between the north and the south; the interests of thousands who depend on the manufacture of agricultural implements or machinery of other sorts are at stake when the farms of Russia are lying untilled or the factories of Germany are closed because men are OFF TO THE WARS.

It is said that "honor" often requires resort to war. "Honor" requires nothing but UPRIGHTNESS. A nation's honor never requires defense by arms.

How trivial are the disputes that would jeopardize the tremendous concerns of international trade and HOW FLIMSY THE CONCEITS which move governments to fancy that they must now violently vindicate their "honor!" Perhaps it is a matter of $10,000 affecting a few fishermen. A man could pay and settle hundreds of disputes over which governments have gone to war, wasting lives and resources in aimless, vain, reckless violence.

"HONOR" DOES NOT CONSTRAIN A NATION TO BE THE JUDGE OF THE CORRECTNESS OF ITS OWN OPINION. RATHER IT FORBIDS THIS AND SUGGESTS THAT A DISINTERESTED TRIBUNAL BE ASKED TO PASS ON THE QUESTION.

The Right Age For Senators.

By United States Senator E. W. PETTUS of Alabama.

I DON'T think we ought to have boys in our legislative bodies, but it isn't a GOOD BUSINESS POLICY to send to congress men who are over fifty-five or sixty years of age. I was seventy-six when I entered upon my duties as United States senator. I was too old then, and I haven't grown any younger in the ten years I've been at work on the floor of the senate. My notion is that men from forty to fifty years old—the average man is in the PRIME OF HIS MENTAL VIGOR at that age—ought to be elected as senators and then kept in service as long as they are able to do the required work.

When You Need Printing Done

You want it to be of the very best kind. As you expect your printed matter to make business it is necessary it should do the talking for you. Poor or indifferent printing cannot do this as it lacks the strong points required to gain and hold the interest of the patron.

¶ In this particular line of work we excel, for several reasons, viz: 1st; we have the largest and best variety of up-to-date type to be found in the western part of the state. 2nd; we carry only the very best grades of papers; and 3rd; the know-how with which to create original and attractive tye display.

¶ You make no mistake when you come to us with an order of printing

IT PAYS TO BUY THE GENUINE ADVERTISED ARTICLE.

When a merchant or manufacturer desires to attract the attention of the public to his goods he usually advertises it in a newspaper which reach the classes among whom he expects to find patrons. It is naturally assumed that the individual or firm investing largely in this form of publicity has goods to sell which the public will find what they are represented to be. The advertiser is entitled to all the benefits which are to be derived from his enterprise in centering the attention of the public upon his wares. The publicity which he thus gives to his business is an evidence of good faith and entitles him to public confidence as long as he is worthy of it.

Advertisements operate as much for the advantage of the buyer as of the seller. They are made the directory which is consulted by discriminating persons before purchasing. They are a distinct convenience for the shopper and an aid to every one in facilitating purchases. The man who advertises deserves to be encouraged by the buyer in proportion to his merits. There is one form of encouragement which is not only in the interest of the advertiser, but of the buyer also. When a person goes into a store to buy an article which is advertised he is sometimes informed that the storekeeper has not that particular article in stock, but has something equally as good. In other words, the customer who asks for genuine goods is urged to buy an imitation because the dealer is able to make a larger profit on the imitation than on the real article. Such a dealer thus derives advantage from advertising which has been paid for by another—and he gets this advantage by playing upon the good nature or the credulty of the public. It is a safe assumption that goods imitated have no merit. On this assumption it would appear that buyers will advance their own interests by purchasing the genuine goods, which are advertised, and not by accepting substitutes which are not advertised and of which they know nothing.

This, after all, the policy of fair play and business sense. The buyer who knows what he wants ought to ask for it and get what he wants. If he insists upon having the genuine article dealers will be compelled to keep it in stock or surrender the field to those who care more for the interests of customers. The protection of buyers rest largely with themselves. When they want an advertised article they should not be satisfied with anything but that article. Then, if it is not of the high quality it was represented to be, they can call the advertiser to account. The public should realize that the imitator of goods which have been accorded popular favor has possibly no reputation to lose. He is trying to create a demand for his goods by offering them, through dealers, as a substitute for an article of permanent merit. For every genuine article there are many imitations. The public should exercise for its own protection the neccessary discrimination. It would not accept counterfeit money, and neither should it accept counterfeit goods. Sterling articles are made by mannfacturers who stake their reputations on the quality of the goods which they offer to the public through the medium of advertisements. The imitation or counterfeit articles are not advertised extensively because it is alleged, they will not bear the scrutiny to which genuine advertised goods are subjected.

It would be well for buyers to bear in mind that the advertised article must be as good, in the main, as it is represented to be, otherwise it could not be sold successfully. If, on the strength of the advertisements of genuine articles and the reputation thus acquired by the manufactures, the effort is made to put off substitutes on the public the buyer may well feel suspicious. The attitude of the public may well be defined in the current vernacular, "I want what I want when I want it.' When this attitude is firmly maintained the public will get what it wants and not what the seller of substitutes persuades it to accept. The responsible manufacturer who stakes his reputation upon the quality of the goods he advertises is logically more to be trusted by the public than those who seek to benefit by his advertising and offer imitations of his products.

Catching Butterflies.

To catch butterflies you must reach out after them. As a rule you won't catch many in your hand. You must use a net. It is the net that scoops them in.

A hand reach in catching butterflies is no better than a handbill in catching business. It is the net that counts.

The net is the newspaper. This reaches out to all the people and scoops them in. Experience of several generations has shown that the newspaper is the best business bringer.

Take, for instance, this paper. (Most people take it.) An announcement in this paper goes into the homes of the people whom you must reach if you get the business you are after.

There is, indeed, a very much larger net that scoops in the business butterflies. It is stretched out not only over this community, but over every similar community in the land. It is the mail order net, made up of big catalogues and of advertisements in periodicals which are circulated broadcast to catch the unwary.

To prevent that great net—which is really an octopus with a thousand tentacles—from catching your trade away from you, wisdom suggests that you use your home net—the local newspaper.

Usually a word to the wise is sufficient.

If you want to keep your patronage or build it up, you must compete with the butterfly catchers from the outside.

The Dollar is the Butterfly. It has green wings, and is attractive to merchants in the big cities just as it is attfactive to you.

If you would catch these pretty butterflies that are circulating around home, you must use the net that circulates around home.

Could anything be plainer?

MONEY SPOILED SIMPLE LI. E.

The story of W. E. Corey, the millionaire head of the United States Steel Company, who is shortly to wed Mabel Gilman, the actress, carries with it an unusually sad commentary on the danger of money. Corey began work at a dollar a day in the mills at Homestead. He and his young wife lived in a small cottage and they worked and saved together, enjoying the pleasures of a simple, unostentatious life. Opportunities for advancement came and young Corey began to step up the latter. In a few years he was on the road to wealth. The companion of his early years was keeping pace with him enjoying and gloring in his promotions. But those happy times had a tragic ending to come. After Corey had reached the point where money was no longer any matter of concern, a trip to New York with some companions placed a temptation in the steel man's way and he fell. The pretty face of Mabel Gilman captivated him. He saw her at the theater. He sought to meet her and did so the first night he saw her. He sent her handsome presents. Before long a magazine reproduced a full page picture of Corey and Miss Gilman together and then the truth was brought to Mrs. Coney that she no longer enjoyed the love and affection of her husband. How bitter the pangs of regret must have been to her as she thought that the steps up the ladder of seeming success were only a treacherous mirage and how she must have wished for the old dollar a day life when the two were happy and contented. Verily, the days of prosperity have their tragedies no less real and no less pathetic than the days of adversity.

THE TIMBER SUPPLY.

Three Times as Much Timber Used Each Year as the Forest Grows.

Every person in the United States is using over six times as much wood as he would use if he were in Europe. The country as a whole consumes every year between three and four times more wood than all of the forests of the United States grow in the meantime. The average acre of forest lays up a store of only 10 cubic feet annually, whereas it ought to be laying up at least 30 cubic feet in order to furnish the products taken out of it. Since 1880 more than 700,000,000,000 feet of timber have been cut out for lumber alone, including 80,000,000,000 feet of timber in excess of the total coniferous stumpage estimate of the Census in 1880.

These are some of the remarkable statements made in Circular 97 of the Forest Service, which deals with the timber supply of the United States and reviews the stumpage estimates made by all the important authorities. A study of the circular must lead directly to the conclusion and the rate at which forest products in the United States have been and are being consumed is far too lavish, and that only one result can follow unless steps are promptly taken to prevent waste in use and to increase the growth rate of every acre of forest in the United States. This result is a timber famine. This country is to-day in the same position with regard to forest resources as was Germany 150 years ago. During this period of 150 years such German States as Saxony and and Prussia, particularly the latter, have applied a policy of government control and regulation which has immensely increased the productivity of their forests. The same policy will achieve even better results in the United States, because we have the advantage of all the lessons which Europe has learned and paid for in the course of a century of theory and practice.

Lest it might be assumed that the rapid and gaining depletion of American forest resources is sufficiently accounted for by the increase of population, it is pointed out in the circular that the increase in population since 1880 is barely more than half the increase in lumber cut in the same period. Two areas supplying timber have already reached and passed their maximum production—the Northeastern States in 1870 and the Lake States in 1890. To-day the Southern States, which cut yellow pine amounting to one-third the total annual lumber cut of the country, are undoubtedly near their maximum. The Pacific States will soon take the ascendency. The State of Washington within a few years has come to the front and now ranks first of all individual States in volume of cut. At present but one-fifth of the total forest area of the United States is embraced in Forests. The remaining four-fifths have already passed or are most likely to pass into private hands. The average age of the trees felled for lumber this year is not less than 150 years. In other words, if he is to secure a second crop of trees of the same size, the lumberman years for the second crop to grow. As a rule, such long-time investments as this waiting would involve do not commend themselves to business men who are accustomed to quick returns. States and the Nation can look much farther ahead. The larger, then, the area of National and State control over woodlands, the greater is the likelihood that the forests of the country will be kept permanently productive.

BITTINGER.

Joseph Hetriech, an employee of the White's Creek Lumber Company, was seriously injured on last Friday afternoon. A heavy piece of timber rolled over his body breaking two or three ribs and fracturing his skull. Dr. Robison, of Grantsville, was called to dress the injuries. The unfortunate man is a son of Charles Hetriech, who resides near this place, and it is hoped that his injuries may not prove fatal.

Dr. Boyer and Miss Mary Groemiller, of Accident, passed through this village last Sunday afternon.

Mr. Sampson Bittinger, of "The Swamps," and Miss Clara Barkholder, of "Bear Hill," were quietly married at the Lutheran parsonage here on Thursday of last week, by Rev. J. B. Shoup.

Letter to E. E. Sollars.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: Not one man in ten knows whether he's wasting money or not, when he paints. It depends on the paint.

With one paint, your job will take 10 gallons and cost $50 for paint and labor;
with another 12 and cost $60;
with another 14 and cost 70;
with another 16 and cost 80;
with another 18 and cost 90;
with another 20 and cost 100;
with another 22 and cost 110.

Here's an example. Professor Irvine, of the Academy, Mercerburg, Pa, painted the floor of his dormitories every year, one year with one paint, next year with the paint of the other dealer there—to divide the business between them—till Devoe came to town.

The job took 90 gallons; takes 60 Devoe. The difference, 30 gallons, $150. He didn't know he was losing $150 a year till he got Devoe.

Another example. When George W Brown, Union, S C, painted B. F. Arthur's house first time it took 30 gallons "cheap" paint; repainted Devoe 14 gallons.

Yours truly,
25 F. W. DEVOE & Co.

Mr. Harry C. Sincell, who has been in Baltimore with his wife for several weeks it which city Mrs. Sincell underwent a severe surgical operation two weeks ago, spent Saturday in Oakland, returning to Baltimore Sunday morning.

There are some people who are mighty careless about throwing old truck into the alleyways. Such people should be taught a little civic pride by a modest fine. It is impossible for the authorities to keep places clean if people will persist in such practices.

The storekeeper who does not advertise and who does not systematize his business might as well put up his shutters. Judicious advertising means financial success. Never in the history of the commercial world has advertising occupied so dominant a place as it does today.

Mr. and Mrs. J. E. McCullough and twin children, Joseph and Josephine, of Hutton, where Mr. McCullough until recently was employed as superintendent of the Garrett Leather Company, departed for Wisconsin this morning where they will make their future home. Mr. McCullough having entered the employ of the United States Leather Company at that point.

Some boys do not earn $20 a year, yet they can afford to smoke cigarettes and to use tobacco in other forms. Little boys should think it over seriously before commencing to use tobacco. Boys who do not use the weed or loaf continuously on the streets are much better models to follow. No boy should wish to pattern after a profane, foul-mouthed worthless street loafer.

Mrs. C. F. Schroeder and little daughter, Mary Miller, returned Saturday evening from Frederick, Md., where the lady was called some time since by the death of her mother. When about to start on the return journey home little Mary Miller was attacked with measles and the physician would not allow her to be moved until the attack had passed. Mr. Shroeder and the remainder of the family, who also went to Frederick to attend the funeral of Mrs Schroeder's mother, returned home some time since.—Grafton Sentinel.

Mr. U. G. Palmer, who has been manager of the Garrett Leather Company at Hutton for the past two or three years, has resigned the position and expects to leave for the goldfields of Nevada within a few weeks, where he has a number of interests which are promising. He is succeeded as manager of the tannery by Mr. Alex. Hayden, of Wisconsin, who is expected to arrive at Hutton today.

Capt. James A. Hayden, State Statistical Agent for Maryland, under the direction of the Agricultural Department at Washington, left Mountain Lake Park yesterday morning for the purpose of making an official visit to others sections of Maryland, first going to Frederick, thence to Hagerstown and on down through Western Maryland to Baltimore, when he will go over on the Eastern Shore. He expects to return to his home about the 26th inst.

Mrs. E. T. Fleming, formerly Miss Lavinia Haulenbeek, will start on a journey across the continent from her home in Oakland, California, on next Saturday, with her three interesting children, Everett, Natalie and Lloyd. The two latter are twins and were born in California since the earthquake. Mrs. Fred. Porter and her little son, of San Francisco, will be in the party. They expect to reach Deer Park about Friday, the 17th inst. Mr. Fleming is traveling agent of the El Paso and Southwestern system with headquarters in San Francisco.

There should be no "faction" in any city. The property of one individual and every improvement made enhances the value of all property in the corporation. Our city is simply one big family. When this is discarded there is little progress. When there is a united pull for anything, its accomplishment is made easy. Envy, jealousy and hatred are things to be despised. Envy is a canker that knaws at the heart and and makes folks sour, discontented and unhappy; jealousy warps the intellect and makes us unfair in passing judgment. Hatred doesn't pay even from a sordid point of view.

Most men who own a watch think they know all about it. They have the number fixed in their memory in case it is stolen. They could probably pick it out from 50 other watches with their eyes shut. But how many men know that their watch is a compass and will tell north from south as accurately as it will tell the time of day? Stanley, the explorer, did not know it until he had groped his way through the dark continent and met a Belgian sailor on the coast. Every watch is a compass. If you point the hour hand to the sun the south is exactly half way between the hour and the figure XII on the dial. Suppose for instance, it is 4 o'clock. Point the hand indicating 4 to the sun and the IX on the watch is exactly south. If it is 8 o'clock point the hand indicating 8 to the sun and the figure X on the dial is due south. No man need get lost if he carries watch.

PROPERTY CHANGES HANDS.

Mr. D. H. Shank Purchased Mr. H. J. Frear's Residence.

Mr. D. H. Shank, Superintendent for the Kendall Lumber Company, who has been residing with his family in Oakland for more than a year, has purchased the residence on Liberty street erected and occupied by Mr. Harry J. Frear and family and will move into it June 1st, at which time Mr. Frear will vacate the premises and remove with his family to Oregon, where he has a position as Superintendent with the Kendall Lumber Company, which corporation owns and is preparing to operate an immense body of timber land.

Mr. Jasper G. Enlow recently purchased from Mr. Ed Offutt one of the uncompleted cottages being erected by the latter on Pennington street and will move into it as soon as the building is finished by the contractor.

Messrs. Hamill & Moore, the Oakland lumbering firm, have purchased for a sum approaching $20,000 from the heirs of the late John P. Jones, of Terra Alta, West Va., a tract of timber land comprising nearly one thousand acres located in the Cheat River valley above Rowlesburg, West Va., which the new owners will operate, shipping their output from Rowlesburg.

The summer residence and grounds of one hundred and sixty acres in extent located near Deer Park and owned by Mr. John W. Williams, of Philadelphia, was sold at public auction on Tuesday of last week in Pittsburg to Mr. J. D. Grimes of that city for the sum of $18,-[illegible] cash.

Mr. Graham Dukehart, Grand Lecturer of Grand Lodge of Maryland, Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons, will make an official visit to Oakland Lodge at a special communication to be held on Friday night, May 17th, when all members are expected to be present. They will take due notice thereof and govern themselves accordingly.

ALTAMONT.

A literary society was organized here on April 17th with Mr. H. Tasker as president and Mr. J. P. Wright as secretary. Last Saturday night the first regular meeting of the society was held when the subject, "Resolved, That Intemperance Has Caused More Suffering and Death Than War," was discussed by the following speakers: To affirm, Messrs. J. P. Wright and Francis McRobie; to deny Messrs. John Rexrode and H. Tasker. The discussion was warm at times and was decided in favor of the negative by Messrs. O. S. Wilson, A. McRobie and George Lee, who were the judges. The speakers in every case acquitted themselves with honor. During the discussion Mr. A. M. Jeffers filled the president's chair who was one of the debaters. Quite a large crowd of interested listeners were in attendance. The subject for discussion at the next meeting will be: Resolved, That Fire is More Destructive Than Water," with the following speakers: To affirm, Messrs. Francis McRobie, J. P. Wright and O. S. Wilson; to deny, Messrs. Hiram Tasker, John Rexrode and Alfred McRobie.

Mr. and Mrs. Abraham Garrett have been visiting friends at Tunnelton during the past two weeks.

Miss Ethel and Master James Comp, who have been visiting their aunt, Mrs. James Coffman at Bloomington for two weeks, returned to their home last Saturday.

Mr. W. S. Upole and family, who moved from here to Upper Potomac over a year ago, returned to their farm near here. All welcome them back as they are good and obliging neighbors.

Mr. James Smith and family were at Oakland on business Saturday of last week. We understand that Noby expects to go back to work for Foreman Smith.

Mr. William Sisk and Nathan B. Spiker, who are employed at Beckman, came home to spend Sunday.

Miss Pleasant Sullivan, one of Bloomington's accomplished young ladies, is stopping with Mrs. E. Matthews' at present. Mr. George Wolf, of Bloomington, was a visitor to the Matthews home Sunday.

Messrs. Isaac Wright and A. H. Friend took in the show in Cumberland last week. "Barney" says he never knew so many elephants existed and that the hippo was immense.

Mr. Jesse Woods has gone to work on the Baltimore and Ohio track.

This is the season of the year when, according to the old adage, a great many people become afflicted with what is commonly called spring fever. While this village is not wholly clear of this dread epidemic, it appears that there are some who have had what may be termed the moving fever, but not movable as we have heaad.

Mrs. J. W. Comp was at Bloomington last Saturday.

Mrs. E. Matthews expects to go to Pittsburg and to points in Ohio in a few days for a visit to friends.

Mr. Harry Comp, who has been telegraph operator at McKenzie, was at home last week taking a vacation.

Mrs. Henry Smith and daughter Miss Lizzie were in Deer Park last Monday.

Mr. E. A. Shaffer, of Oaklnd, has been one of the regular operators at the Altamont block for several weeks. He is will liked by the coworkers employed here as he is an excellent young man and a splendid operator.

Mr. and Mrs. Theo George are on a visit to Mrs. George's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Teats, at Accident.

Mrs. Asa Day, who has been seriously ill for some time, is, we are glad to state, much improved.

Several cars of props, lumber and posts have been shipped from this point recently by Mr. John Speicher, Ashby Lumber Company, Wilson Store Company and F. L. Warnick.

Mr. Walter Hirshman, who is managing the Herman Beckman farm, was taken suddenly ill a short time ago is much improved at this time and expects to be out in a few days.

Mr. Vernon Jackson, who has been working in the lumber camps at Glady, West Va., is home for a few days.

Mr. G. F. Comp is handling interlocking levers at Piedmont, W. Va.

Mrs. Richard Roy, who has been indisposed for some time and at present stopping with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. George Fulmer at Oakland, in order to be near her physician, is improving we are glad to say.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company is moving the cross-over switches at the water station about three hundred feet east, which will be quite an advantage in handling cars at that point. Foreman Thomas Boyles, of Piedmont, is doing the work.

Miss A. H. Friend has purchased a fine phonograph, so when we get lonely we know where to go for amusement.

Mrs. Mary Spiker was visiting at Thomas Croston's one day last week.

THIRD TERM IS FAVORED IN THE WEST

Sen. Hansbrough of North Dakota, Wants President Roosevelt to Run Again.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7.—"The Republicans of the country are for Roosevelt now; they will be for him when the Republican national convention meets next year; they'll nominate him for another term; he will accept and he will be elected."

This was the statement made by Senator Hansbrough at the White House. He wanted it understood though, that he spoke for himself, uttered his own thoughts and had not consulted any body else. He went on to declare that the fight against the trusts was in such a condition that the President's continuance in office for another term was imperative, and he felt confident that the people looked at it in this way too.

Senator Hansbrough has not been a daily visitor to the White House like Senator Bourne, whose face is now the most familiar seen at the executive officers, but he stands close to the President, and has had many talks with him and with Secretary Loeb, who is the repository of more political secrets than any man in the administration. This statement of the North Dakota senator reveals a curious uncertainty among people and politicians in the far west as to what may be expected of the president as to the nomination. Senators from that section who have talked with him go away with conflicting views as to just what they should do. Because of the Roosevelt feeling in their states they are perfectly willing to support the renomination of the President. Many of them have sought to find out what the President himself desired, and they visited him before returning to their homes. Senator Burkett of Nebraska, visited the President several weeks ago and an hour later gave out an interview favoring the President for a third term, but privately told some of his frieuds that the President had declared that under no circumstances would he accept another nomination. Senator Long went to the executive offices, had his little talk, went away with the impression that the President was really out of it, and on returning home gave out an interview saying that Taft was the man the people should nominate. Senator Bourne has visited the President and his secretary thirty or forty times in the last two months, and yet he comes out in a thrilling interview for a third term. He ought to know what the Presideut feels as well as any man. He speaks for Oregon.

Eben W. Martin was until the 4th of March a representative from South Dakota. He saw the President before going home, had a long talk with him and then gave out an interview favoriug the chief executive for four years more in his present office. Senator Kittredge of the same state, a big man in the Senate, mentally and physically, has had several talks with the President, but probably not on this subject. However, he has come out for nomination and is working for him.

Representative Hull of Iowa saw the president and declared that no man could get the delegates from that state until the people were absolutely sure that the President was not in the running.

Senator Warner of Missouri, a close friend of the President, and a frequent visitor of the White House, has indicated that the Republicans of that state are waiting for the word from Washington to fall in line for a third term.

PROTECT THE ROADS.

Value of Planting Trees Along the Highways.

That many men sincerely believed that trees which shaded the public highway were not worth a fair rental of the ground they covered was proved by their toiling to destroy every tree that stood on that strip of land, says Good Roads Magazine. But in those days the highway was undrained except by a shallow gutter, more or less open, and little was then known and even less was done about making the public thoroughfare much more than a lane, which was muddy in wet weather and a barren, sunburnt and dusty strip in dry times. Having no way by which to run off, water stood in the shade of the few trees which were allowed to reach their arms over the driveway. Narrow tires cut deep into the softened earth in such spots, and lasting mudholes were thus made.

Farmers found that the shade of trees standing beside the highways delayed when they did not wholly prevent the growth of crops near the road, but this may have been largely because little or no thought was given to saving or to planting trees of the right kind or trimming the trees so as to get the benefit they could give, yet avoid the injury they might do by shading ground that might have produced food for man.

New light has come in this country on the subject of road-making and now the truth is known that good drainage is the first essential of good roads. Well made earth roads have no place where water can stand, as it stands through weeks or even through months where there is bad management of roads. Today the plan is to keep the foundation of all roads dry by good drainage and the surface slightly moist yet never let it become so wet and soft that wheels can cut it badly.

Shade trees of the right shape beside a road tend to keep the driveway so moist that swift wheels cannot easily suck up much of its surface to scatter it in clouds of dust over the neighborhood. Roots of such trees bind the earth of the ditches, the banks of cuts and slopes of fills, and by so doing retard it they do not entirely prevent the washing away that melting snows and pelting rains would cause but for these roots.

By their shade such trees hinder if they do not wholly stop the growth of weeds that would choke the ditches, cumber the roadsides and seed down the fields of the farmer, and by preventing such harmful growths they save time, labor and money that otherwise must go to maintain the road or to destroy weeds among the crops.

As windbreaks such trees help to keep gales from picking up the finer particles from the road to scatter them over grass and fruit and grain to sift them over flowers and food, clothing and furniture. They help to hold the snow on field and road when, but for them, it would be blown from soil and grain field to bank behind stack and fence and building, where it does no good. In springtime such trees check the melting of the snows and so help to keep them from washing away the driveway, scouring out the ditches and from flooding the lowlands.

Trees of suitable kinds along the roads attract people who have means to get what they want, leisure and culture that enable them to value and enjoy the comfort and beauty of a road so adorned, money with which to buy land and pay for its improvement, and influence which can often induce the powers to leave undone those things they ought to do for the good of the community.

Men trained by long experience and by study to use their money shrewdly to get the biggest possible returns cheerfully pay large sums to get labels or packages that will catch the eye and please the taste of possible buyers of the goods those packages hold. Such business men know that the pleasing appearance of a cover does much to sell for $5 to $6 grain for which the farmer is glad to get a little more than a dollar when he markets it in bulk or in a bag.

Many a time a pleasant drive has led people of means to buy a summer home in a neighborhood and to bring their friends to do likewise. This made a market at town lot prices for farm lands and a ready demand at good figures at the very door of the farmer for his fruit and vegetables, milk and butter, poultry and eggs. It has helped to swell the tax lists even though it reduced the tax rate and helped the neighborhood to make improvements it could not have afforded without such help and by doing so has further raised the selling value of the acres near.

Many an illustration of this effect of attractiveness of country roads may be seen in New England and New York, where the coming of people of wealth and refinement, accompanied by improvements they have caused, has increased the prices of farm lands so greatly as to make their owners rich.

BLOOMINGTON.

The first house in the new town of Marsteller is under construction and will be occupied, when finished, by Mr. Burke, who moves from Barnum and will become the first resident of what promises to be one of the prettiest little places in all the county side. This is the first one of fifteen or twenty dwellings to be erected by the Marsteller Coal Company, for the convenience of their miners. The town is located on the uplands, northeast of the B. & O. bridge on the West Virginia side, the site being selected by Mr. Michael Marsteller, president of the Company, for the healthfulness of its surroundings.

Joseph, the 2-year-old son of Stanley Mitchell, of Franklin, came near losing his left hand on last Thursday afternoon. While playing with a dynamite cartridge near his home, it exploded lacerating the thunb and two front fingers to such an extent that amputation of the injured member became necessary.

N. U. Bnnd, of Bond, returned on Wednesday from a business trip to Pittsburg.

G. C. Pattison is on a trip to the Eastern cities in the interest of his coal business.

Dan Raley, of the Uniontown base ball team, spent a few days last week here the guest of his family. His brother Ross signed a contract with the Braddock team and reported for duty the early part of last week.

Misses June Kight, of Piedmont, and Alma Kemp, of this place, the guests of County Commissioner Howard Bishop and family of Cross on last Saturday and Sunday.

Nearly every family in town is busy this week with open drains, torn up board walls, mud and dirt knee deep preparatory to the installation of water in their homes. My! what a cussing time we are having.

James Coffman, track foreman on the B. & O. is in a fix. He don't swear for he is a good man and belongs to church, but I bet you he feels a good deal like a man when he does a little blaspheming. His entire gang of Italian trackmen stopped work on last Monday morning, because one of their number was accidentally killed by stepping in front of No. 14 on last Friday evening. The spirit of the dead man returned and told his companions in life to "skiddoo" and they did, leaving Mr. Coffman single handed and to battle with all the work and difficulties of his keeping his section in running condition.

Mr. Fanzey, head sawyer for the Bond Mill at Bond, was kicked by his horse on last Thursday noon, and sustained a fracture of the left hand. This makes the third accident that has occurred at the mill in the last week. Mr. Hugh Bateman had his left leg broken on Tuesday and a young man by the name of Ryland had his right leg broken on Wednesday.

SHAMS AND THEIR SPECIES.

"Uncle," said a southern man to an old negro who was selling apples, "why is it that the top of your basket is mostly big apples, and the bottom is mostly little apples?"

"Well, suh," replied the old man, scratching his head, "I spec' hit's fur de same reason dat de front of yo' house is mostly marble an' de back is mostly ash-cans."

The top of the basket was a sham and the front of the house was a sham.

There are all sorts of shams.

There are the sham people—sham doctors, sham layers, sham teachers sham lovers and all the rest, including sham wives and sham husbands.

There are the sham virtues—sham modesty, sham charity, sham principles, sham gratitude, sham friendship.

There are the sham vices, too, because there is many a man who pretends to be worse than he is or dares to be.

There is the whole catalogue of sham appearances—sham position in society, sham conversation wherein you try to impress others with your sham knowledge, sham dinners off of sham silver, sham signs of prosperity when every mail says, "please remit."

There is sham politics, seem through the thin veil of sham patriotism.

There is any quantity of sham religion, sitting in sham churches and listening to sham sermons by sham preachers.

What kind of sham are you?

One of the rarest things in this world of ours is genuineness. One of the highest compliments you can pay a man is to be able to say of him, "he is genuine, he is sincere in all he is and all he does."

But the world keeps on improving. We've got to believe that, you know, if we believe anything is worth while.

Think what a wonderful world it is going to be when there is no more pretense in it; when we are not ashamed when we are poor, not envious when we are unsuccessful; not clamoring for social recognition because we are content to be what we are; not blushing when our coat is out at elbows, because it is no reproach to wear an old coat so long as we can wear it honestly and bravely, any more than it is a reproach to love our little home, humble though it may be.

It will be a good world to live in then, when other people have stopped shamming, and we have stopped shamming, too.

HONEST ABE, U. S. M.

Tries His Hand at Verse Again and Makes a Hit.

POETIZES THREE WEDDINGS.

And Is Given the Glad Hand by Those He Aided In Their Lovemaking. Picked as Next President of the United States.

[Copyright, 1906, by E. C. Parcells.]

I learned almost as soon as I had started out on my route the next day that there had been doings at the house of Farmer Johnson, and when I got along there it was to find the farmer waiting at the gate and to call out to me:

"Abe, you've got to come in and have a glass of hot cider and a bite of the wedding cake. Mary and Joe Holmes was married the other day."

"Shoo! You don't tell me!"

"Yes, sir; married as slick as grease and are now as happy as two yearlin' colts. They've gone to town today to see about the furniture, but you must come in and give us some of that poetry of yours. They want it to start out in life with. Both of 'em said that it would be as good as a hundred dollars in cash."

"THEY TOOK A SUDDEN HEADER."

Joe and Mary.

I went in, and, feeling in the humor for it, I drank the cider, ate the cake and dashed off the following:

Joe Holmes and Mary Johnson, after courting for a year,
Have been wed by old Squire Jackson hard and fast.
There's an end of nights of sparking, with
Cupid for their cheer,
And the period of the gumdrop it has passed.

No longer hands a-squeezing, no longer does he vow
That she's a heavenly angel all but wings.
The problem now with Joseph is just exactly how He's going to face the racket marriage brings.

He'll have to hump and hustle and get a move on him,
And by and by there'll come a red faced
babe,
A teenty weenty infant with much amazing vim,
And of course no name will fit him but that of Honest Abe.

Farmer Holmes shook my hand and winked and his wife shook my hand and smiled when the verses were read to them, and after another glass of cider I took my departure, feeling that it was good to have been born a poet. A mile farther down the road I found Farmer Kent mending a fence. There was a grin on his face as I came up, and after a moment he said:

"Abe, they've gone and done it."

"Who? What?"

"Sarah and Jim Ward. I guess you knew they was in love and acting like two mushrooms."

"You don't mean they have committed suicide?"

"Naw! Got married three days ago and have gone over to his sister's on their bridle tower. I don't know what a bridle or a tower has to do with it, but that's what they call it, I believe."

"Well, Jim's a steady young fellow," I said.

"Yes; he'll have to do. I sorter wanted Sarah to marry a windmill man and bring some style into the family, but maybe it's just as well to have Jim. Say, they left special word for you, and we might as well go to the house. They've got to have some poetry on to it. Can't get out of it, Abe—can't possibly do it."

Jim and Sarah.

Fifteen minutes later I had left behind me at the house the following poetic effusion, which I entitled "The Uvelting and Ungrammatical Romance of Two Loving Souls:"

They fell in love at spelling school,
Jim Ward and Sarah Kent,
And Cupid shot an arrow that
Through both their hearts it went.

He loved her for her big blue eyes;
She loved him for his smile,
And for a year and maybe more
Young Cupid did beguile.

They vowed they'd never loved before;
They vowed and went asunder;
They quarreled, as all lovers do,
And raised a lot of thunder.

But love was there, I'm glad to say,
And brought them back to reason;
Their hands before the preacher clasped,
And marriage in due season.

Here's loping every luck for them!
May children ten surround them;
May Cupid smile and wink as cute
As when his darts first found them.

The next stopping place was at Farmer Jones'. His wife waved a red rag at me from a window as I came along the road, and, thinking she wanted to ask me about a money order, I got down from my cart and went in. Her old man sat at the stove toasting his shins, and they both greeted me with smiles as I entered.

"What's up?" I asked as they continued to smile and chuckle.

"Hist! They are up there!" whispered the farmer as he pointed to the ceiling.

"What do you mean—rats?"

"Rats be hanged! I mean Will Bones and our Sarah. Didn't you hear they got married day before yesterday?"

"N-n-o!"

"Just got j'ined together and made one, and you never saw a rooster or hen more happy. Help yourself to fodder there. We didn't make much of a spread, but you'll find currant wine and sweet cake."

"But why aren't they down here to be congratulated?" I asked.

"Natural modesty, Abe, natural modesty. When ma shook the rag to bring you in they both dusted upstairs. Now, about the poetry."

"What poetry?"

"Don't ask questions, but sit down and turn the crank. Do you think we are going to let such an event as this pass without some of your poetry? Why, you wrote us eight verses the time our old cow got mired in the swamp."

William and Sarah.

Thus appealed to, I sat down and wrote:

'Twas William Bones and Sarah Jones
Who Sunday went a-walking;
They wandered here, they wandered
there;
Of love they were a-talking.

'Twas William Bones and Sarah Jones
Who reached the raging river,
And as they gazed upon its flood
They shivered a cold shiver.

'Twas William Bones and Sarah Jones
While gazing on the water
Got nearer to the river's bank
Than anybody orter.

Then William Bones and Sarah Jones—
They took a sudden header.
The bank caved in—a splash, a scream;
'Twas into this he led her.

But William Bones caught Sarah Jones
In arms that never faltered
And brought her safely to the shore.
And thus was Cupid haltered.

Then William Bones and Sarah Jones
Knew that they loved each other,
And matrimony followed, and
The one's the same as t'other.

Now, William Bones and Sarah Jones
They could have done no better,
But for that plunge into the stream
They'd never got no wetter.

"Say, ma," whispered the husband as I finished reading the verses and looked up, "do you know who's going to be the next president of the United States?"

"Honest Abe, of course," she promptly replied.

"You bet your black stockings! And now you get four rolls of butter out of the cellar for him to take along with him. Butter and poetry jest fit each other." M. QUAD.

Reform.

In a little Alabama town a score of years ago there was a shiftless colored boy named Wash Jones, who after being caught in a number of petty delinquencies was at last sentenced to a short term in the penitentiary, where he was set to learn a trade. On the day of his return home he met a friendly white acquaintance, who asked:

"Well, what did they put you at in the prison, Bill?"

"Dey started in to make an honest boy out'n me, sah."

"That's good, Bill, and I hope they succeeded."

"Dey did, sah."

"And how did they teach you to be honest, Bill?"

"Dey done put me in de shoe shop, sah, nailin' pasteboard outer shoes fo' soles, sah."—Woman's Home Companion.

His Only Say.

In a rural justice's court the defendant in a case was sentenced to serve thirty days in jail. He had known the judge from boyhood and addressed him as follows:

"Bill, old boy, you're agwine ter send me ter jail, air you?"

"That's what," replied the judge. "Have you got anything to say ag'in it?"

"Only this here, Bill. God help you when I git out!"—News.

Hard Luck.

Lizzie—Bother you, Jimmy! All through torkin' to you I've swallowed me sweet and lost me five minutes' suck.—Sloper's Half Holiday.

Our Best Society.

Governess (in smart set family)—Why, how loving you children are! Such affection between brother and sister is delightful to see.

Olive—Yes'm. We're playin' growed ups. I'm the husband an' Barbara she's the maid.—Puck.

SHAW'S VIEW OF IT.

Former Secretary of the Treasury Talks on Public Ownership.

Government Employees Never as Efficient as the Employees of Firms and Corporations—Tenure of Office In the Civil Service Breeds Slipshod Ways.

There are over 20,000 public servants, exclusive of presidential appointees, under the direct supervision of the department at the head of which I had the honor to temporarily preside. They are a good, conscientious, painstaking body of men and women, and yet if the treasury department were a private enterprise every whit as much work could be accomplished with a reduction of one-third in number and one-fourth in the salary of those remaining. This condition is not to be charged to civil service rules and regulations, of which I most heartily approve, but to the inherent nature of public service.

Some years ago while walking through Lincoln park, Chicago, I noticed a group of twenty-five or more men pushing lawn mowers. Stopping to make some inquiry of a policeman, I innocently asked why the city did not use mowers drawn by horses. I shall long remember his reply: "I guess you don't live in Chicago, do you? How long do you think the city administration would live if it mowed the park with horses?"

The cornerstone of the city hall in Philadelphia was laid on July 4, 1874, but the building was not completed until the first year of the present century. The capitol at Albany was begun in the sixties, it was far enough advanced to be the scene of an inaugural ball in the seventies and was completed, all save the tower, for which the foundation was found insufficient, in 1899. In the meantime the two great political parties alternated in control, and I am told in one or more instances four generations performed work on the building.

The appropriation for the public building in Chicago was signed by Grover Cleveland, and about sixty days ago I made final settlement and signed the draft for the last payment and was then able to answer public criticism because the work had progressed so slowly with record proof that it had been about as expeditiously built as most structures of its character erected by the government.

The Harlem river, extending from the Hudson to the East river, eight miles in length, was dredged by the government to a depth of fifteen feet in seventeen years.

Now note a few instances of private enterprise. In 1904 the Pennsylvania railroad began the construction of twin tunnels through the mud beneath the Hudson river and four tunnels extending thence under the city of New York and beneath the East river to Long Island City, and now at the end of two years feels confident that its fifteen miles of nineteen foot waterproof tunnel will be completed and in use within the contract period of four years.

John B. McDonald began work on the subways of New York in March, 1900, and had nine miles with double track and stations in operation in four years and seven months.

These instances illustrate the natural, the necessary and the inevitable differences between private enterprise and government work and might be multiplied indefinitely.

I do not know that I can explain the reasons why these differences must and always will exist better than to recite a very commonplace experience. I received a telegram some days ago from the cashier of a little bank in which I am interested. It read: "I am offered $42.50 an acre for your East Boyer land. What shall I do?" I answered: "You know better than I do. Do as you think best." To this he replied, "I think the land is well sold." These telegrams were not even preserved. But if I had been acting for the government I would have had the land advertised for sale, I would have sent a commission to examine and appraise it, I would have had not less than two subordinate officers of the department go through all the papers and submit their recommendations, I would then have rendered final decision, but I would have been careful to preserve a complete record of everything, lest on some unhappy day after my retirement and perhaps after my demise an investigating committee, appointed perchance by an adverse congress, would make inquiry and, failing to find positive proof of honesty, would make a report filled with suggestions of doubt, and that would be quite enough to brand my name with shame. My subordinates took the same precautions and safeguard their reputations with an equal amount of red tape whenever they sell an old horse or wornout piece of furniture.

It is the appropriate function of the government to safeguard the individual and to see that the game of business is fairly played, that the cards are held above the table and that everybody is given a square deal. It is not the appropriate function of the government to sit in the game.

Control Easier Than Operation.

The plea for municipal ownership seems logical in communities that appear to be unable to control public utility corporations. But if cities with all their law making and law enforcing power cannot cope with corporations which operate by their sufferance, would they be more able to manage these companies themselves?—Kansas City Star.

DIVIDING THE REWARD.

By Henry Stroule.

Copyright, 1907, by C. H. Suteliffe.

Bertha looked up in dismay as the stranger entered. Kenton City was not so far ahead of a frontier town that holdups were absolutely unknown, and the sudden appearance of this brawny intruder did not suggest a peaceful errand.

Tremblingly she made change for the fifty dollar gold certificate he handed her after deliberately testing its genuineness and pushed the little pile of bills toward him.

"Aren't you rather young to be left in charge of a bank?" he asked as he deposited the change in his wallet. "I supposed that three or four men were the usual crew, not a little girl."

"I am not a little girl," she said indignantly. "I'm nineteen, and I guess this will help me out."

"This" was a huge revolver, and as she held it toward him he noticed that it trembled in her uncertain grasp. "I'm satisfied," he said, with a laugh. "Please put it down."

"I guess there's no one going to rob this bank even if there is only a girl in charge," she said defiantly. "Anyhow, father and the cashier will be back from lunch shortly."

"They lunch rather late here," was the significant retort as he glanced at the clock. "Three o'clock lunches are rather rare in Kenton City, are they not?"

Bertha's heart sank. So he must know that her father was ill in bed and that the cashier, the only other official of the bank, had gone over to the railroad. Perhaps he knew also that in the vaults were the payrolls of the two mines which made the First National a financial possibility.

"We were busy this morning," she stammered. "I guess pa will get back soon."

"I want to see him a moment," was the quiet response. "With your permission, I guess I'll wait."

"Perhaps," she suggested, "he may stay home. I don't know. He said

HE HAD WHIPPED OUT A REVOLVER AND HAD THE OTHER COVERED.

something this morning about wanting to see to some things about the house."

"I'll wait around for awhile," he said, with a smile. "I have plenty of time, and with pleasant company"— He bowed courteously to Bertha.

"I can't put you out," she said, with a toss of her head.

"If I intrude," he suggested, "I can put myself out."

This was just what Bertha did not want. If he was planning to rob the vaults and was waiting until his confederates came up, there was a chance that some one might come in before then who could help her secure him. He answered to the description of Butte Bill, who led a gang of cutthroats and whose picture adorned a handbill posted on the inner side of the wire screen. She hastened to make pleasant reply, and presently she had forgotten the character of her visitor in the charm of his conversation.

Robber he might be, but he was certainly a most charming fellow and had traveled far. He soon had her so interested in his tales of "back east," that promised land of which she had heard so much and seen nothing at all, that she was sorry when at last the clock chimed 4 and she was forced to rouse herself and announce that it was time to close the doors.

"I've enjoyed our little visit immensely," he said, with a smile. "I am sorry that it must be interrupted. I hope to see you again. May I suggest that you be careful to see that the vaults are securely locked? You see, I hear that there is a gang of desperadoes in these parts, and it would be well not to put temptation in their way."

Bertha glanced at the "$5,000 Reward" on the circular and made up her mind. Butte must not be permitted to escape. She caught up the gun from its position on the shelf and slipped out of the cage. There was an opening in the counter near the front door, and just as she reached it she whipped out her gun.

"Put up your hands," she commanded. "You didn't know it, but I had your picture there on a handbill."

His hands had gone above his head at the first command, and now he towered above her, still smiling.

"There is some mistake," he said. "If you will kindly turn aside my coat you will find a detective's star there that should vouch for me."

He approached as though to permit her to carry out his request, but she retreated before him.

"Not much," she declared. "That would give you a splendid chance to overpower me. You keep your distance."

"But I can't hold my hands over my head all night," he pleaded. "What are you going to do with me?"

"Some one will come for me if I do not go home," she explained. "You won't have to wait for more than an hour."

The intruder groaned. "You don't suppose that I can keep my arms in the air that long, do you?" he demanded. "I'd rather have you shoot."

"I will if you come any closer," she warned. He stepped back, and for ten minutes he looked eagerly out of the door. Then he gave a cry, and with a sigh of relief Bertha turned her head to greet the newcomer.

For an instant she gasped, for the newcomer's arms went above his head promptly, and his revolver went clattering to the ground. In general appearance he was the double of her first visitor, though he lacked the frankness, expression and genial lines about the eyes.

His action reminded her of her captive, and she turned. To her surprise he had whipped out a revolver and had the other covered.

"Will you oblige me by feeling in my coat and taking out a pair of handcuffs you will find there?" he asked.

Bertha drew out the glistening bracelets and snapped them about the newcomer's wrists. Then the other man came forward, and with the heavy leather belt he wore about his waist he fastened his victim's feet.

"This is Butte Bill," he explained as he dragged his captive to a chair. "There are probably two others of the gang waiting outside. You stand over him and shoot him if he attempts to get away. "I'll see if I can round up the others."

Depriving the bandit of his weapons, the stranger slipped out. Presently there was a sound of firing, then a silence. The girl and the man in the bank stirred uneasily. Bill was anxious as to the fate of his accomplices, and Bertha felt an unaccountable strong interest in the welfare of the stranger.

The minutes that sped by seemed like hours until, with a whoop, a crowd burst into the bank and relieved her of her guard duty. The stranger was in the van, a bloody handkerchief wrapped about his left hand and a thin stream of blood trickling down the side of his face.

"I'm not hurt," he aid, with a laugh, as he saw her look of dismay—"just a scratch on the head and a ball through the palm."

"The sheriff can take care of these men," she said. "Come home with me and let me fix you up."

Rapidly she closed the vaults and led him down the street to the little home where her first aid to the injured had more than once gained her the title of "the little doctor."

Over the bandaging he told her that he was a railroad detective looking for some car thieves and that one of the Butte band had mistaken him for the leader and had uncovered the bank plot to him. He had seen a chance to earn the reward, and so he had sought an excuse for lingering around the bank until the desperado had put in an appearance.

"I did not want to alarm you," he explained, "so I said nothing, though if I had had my hands in the air much longer I should have had to speak in self defense."

"And I thought I was earning the reward," she laughed.

"You did," he insisted.

"Not at all," she contradicted.

"Then half," he pleaded.

She shook her head, and it was six weeks later before Greg Hallett's hand healed and they effected a compromise. Then they used the reward for the honeymoon.

The Value of an Opinion.

One of the most discouraging features in the case of the young man who stays at home is the fact that, no matter what he may do, he seldom is given credit. If he takes his father's business and makes it go big, everybody gives the credit to the father. I know of one case in a small western city. A merchant who had been considered wealthy and prominent died and left everything to his son. The boy had been away from home for three years and was doing fairly well in a strange city without relying upon paternal assistance. He returned and took hold of the business. To his surprise, he found conditions rotten. Beyond the good will the assets scarcely would cover the liabilities. He dug in, worked desperately and in two years' time had things straightened out and was on the highroad to prosperity. A sudden business collapse in the town, followed by a bank crash, caught him hard, and he was forced to assign. He paid dollar for dollar, yet today in that town they point him out as a man who wrecked his father's business.—Jonas Howard in Chicago Tribune.

Happily Answered.

One of the hardest things for a player to bear is when an audience laughs during a serious scene. Many a performer by his wit has been able to save a scene. An incident of this kind was experienced by the late Thomas Keene while playing Richard III. He had just finished exclaiming "A horse! A horse! My kingdom for a horse!" when a young man in the audience called out, "Won't a donkey do?" and Mr. Keene quietly responded, "Yes; come up."

To pay this amount it was ascertained that the taxable property as shown by the Assessment Books amounts to $8,175,485.00, which, at 93 cents on the $100 will make the above amount for County purposes—$76,031.76.

Deducting $635,419.00 for Corporations paying direct to the State Treasurer leaves the basis $7,540,039.00 at 16 cents on each $100, makes $12,064.06, and this added makes the taxes for State and County purposes $88,095.82.

PRESENTED WITH LIFE CERTIFICATE TO TEACH

Two Of Garrett County's Teachers Signally Honored.

Miss Marion B. Leary and Miss May Hamill, both of Oakland, were each presented with a life certificate as teachers at the local normal school on last Tuesday afternoon. Supt. E. A. Browning and Dr. E. H. Bartlett, of the county school Board, were present and conducted the exercises.

The certificates were awarded by the State Board of Education. They carry with them the authority to teach without examination, in any of the schools of the State of Maryland to which either of them may be duly elected.

The honor conferred upon these two worthy young ladies of Garrett county increases when it is known they are the first female teachers of Garrett who were ever awarded a life certificate.

The presentation of the certificates was a public one so that other teachers may be stimulated to strive for a similar honor, carrying with it all that it does. It was pointed out by the county superintendent, Mr. E. A. Browning, that a person who applies for such a certificate must have taught seven years, five of them in Maryland; that the applicant must be a holder of a first-class, first-grade certificate at the time of application; that the party must be highly recommended by the pastor of the church of which he or she is a member; that the county school board must recommend the petition to the State Board; and finally, it is required that the applicant must have a certificate from the secretary of the state reading circle, in which it is certified that the teacher who seeks the life certificate has performed the work outlined by the state reading circle. From these requirements it is seen that it is no easy thing to win a state life certificate; it is also well known that the possessor of one has labored hard and well to secure this recognition of the State Board. And, furthermore, the State Board reserves the right at all times to cancel the certificate should the holder thereof be thought not entitled to the same.

The presentation speech was made by Dr. E. H. Bartlett, clerk to the local school board. Prof. M. K. Turner made the response for the recipients of the certificates. At the close of Prof. Turner's response, Mr. F. E. Rathbun was asked to say a few which he did in a humorous vein.

Dr. Bartlett, in his speech of presentation, said in part:

"These certificates, young ladies, entitle you to teach in any of the schools of the State without an examination. You owe nothing to the State for them; but by your faithful work of seven years, our State owes you these certificates and these new honors; the honor is owed only to yourselves, the State simply acknowledges itself as indebted to you, and in recognition thereof gives you these certificates.

"In fact you have done what none other could do for you. It is your own labors alone which qualify you to be teachers, and which justify the state board to be able to give you these diplomas.

"It is not my purpose to try to be eloquent. The occasion does not demand it. This meeting and this presentation is intended merely as a lesson to the other teachers here; to stimulate and inspire them to win by their efforts for themselves the honors that are conferred here this afternoon. You owe nothing to the State of Maryland for these honors; but to yourselves is due all credit and praise.

"In conclusion, I want to say that no happier occasion has ever presented itself to me for many years. The joy that is mine in presenting these is to be compared only to the commencement day of fifty-two years ago, when I was the recipient of my diploma."

At the close of the meeting, Miss Hamill and Miss Leary were heartily congratulated upon their success as teachers and upon their recognition by the State Board of Education.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. JEMIMA MOWERY.

Died, at the home of her son at Westernport, on Friday of last week, very suddenly of heart disease, Mrs. Jemima Mowery, of near Swanton, this county. Mrs. Mowery was quite aged and at the time of her death was on a visit to her son. Her funeral took place at Westernport on Sunday.

MRS. PETER J. LOHR.

Died, at her home near Deer Park, after several weeks of suffering with heart disease, Mrs. Peter J. Lohr, on Sunday night last. Mrs. Lohr is survived by her husband and seven children, five daughters and two sons. Her funeral took place Monday afternoon, the interment being made in the Deer Park cemetery.

Order of Railway Conductors.

The Order of Railway Conductors have invaded Memphis, Tenn., for the purpose of holding the annual convention.

No. 3 train last Sunday was occupied fore and aft with B. and O. conductors and their families. Captains Shipley, Hildebrand and Gearey were in the party, and they were full of interesting incidents of railway life. All of them know every foot of the Seventeen Mile grade and indeed the whole line and all had a good word to say of Oakland and its healthful and invigorating climate. Capt. Kent was the conductor in charge of the train.

COURT HOUSE CONTRACT WAS AWARDED MONDAY

To Mr. W. A. Liller, of Keyser, at His Bid of $60,962.00.

The adjourned meeting of the Court House Commission of Garrett county was held on Monday of this week in the rooms of the Bar Association in Oakland at which time the contract for the erection of the proposed new Court House for Garrett county was awarded to Mr. W. A. Liller, of Keyser, West Va., for the sum of $60,962, exclusive of the plumbing, heating and lighting, which contract was let to Messrs. A. D. Naylor & Co., of Oakland, for the sum of $5,822.

The building will be ninety-six by one hundred and twenty-feet, in the shape of a cross, with three floors, exclusive of the basement, the latter being planned to accommodate the heating plant and necessary coal bunkers, toilet rooms and storage vaults for old records and papers.

The main entrance to the building will be from Alder street and on the first floor will be located offices and private rooms for the County Treasurer, Orphans' Court, County Commissioners and Clerk of the Circuit Court. Each of these offices will be provided with its individual fire-proof vault. In the centre of the building and running from the first floor to the dome is a rotunda from which doors lead to the various offices above named.

From the first floor to the second floor a double stairway is provided which is carried on up to the third floor.

On the second floor will be located the court room which will amply accommodate a very large number of people. It will be constructed along the lines of a modern theatre with gently sloping floors and with a balcony on two sides. The ceiling will be high and the room will be lighted and ventilated by the most modern methods. In the rear of the court room four other rooms have been provided which will be used by the Court, members of the bar and for the accommodation of witnesses who are excluded from the court room during the trial of cases in which they are interested.

On this floor is also located offices for the State's Attorney, School Commissioners and the Court library.

On the third floor will be two rooms for the accommodation of petit juries, six other office rooms, the grand jury room and two rooms for witnesses before the grand jury.

The building will be constructed of a light colored pressed brick with stone trimmings, slate roof and the dome covered with copper.

While the contract covering the construction and plumbing is several thousand dollars below the amount authorized by the voters to be expended in erecting and furnishing the building, other and additional expenses must be met by the Commission which will probably require the expenditure of the entire appropriation of $75,000.

The Opinionless Man.

The Scriptures say that the doubleminded man is unstable in all his ways. But the doubleminded man is perhaps an improvement over the excuse of an individual who has no mind of his own at all. A lot of fellows are mere figureheads, absolute nonentities. They count for nothing in the community and were they to pass off the stage of action only a very few of their most intimate friends would know of their departure. This harmless individual simply lives because the Creator is kind enough to furnish him air to breathe, but he does next to nothing for the improvement or betterment of the time in which he lives. In business, the opinionless man is a drawback to enterprise; in politics he can never be counted on by either side and is held in contempt by the men whose buisness it is to make an estimate of where the voters stand. In any walk of life the man who exists rather than lives is little short of a detriment to advancement along all lines. But we have several of that kind and we do not know that any amount of "preaching" will cause one of them to wake up and stand for something.

$25 Reward.

Twenty-five dollars reward will be paid for information that will lead to the arrest and conviction of the party or parties who broke and carried away the water pipes, spigots, etc., from the Lambert, Shelleberger and Haywood cottages located in the suburbs of Oakland.

FRED. A. THAYER,
State's Attorney.

NOT IN ACCORD WITH OUR USAGE

Mr. Jacob Brown Inveighs Strongly Against a Third Term.

It is true there is nothing in our constitution or the laws thereunder to prevent a President from being elected than more twice. The constitution provides the manner of his election and the length of his term, 4 years, but nothing as to the number of terms. I am not a believer in what is now styled unwritten law, but there is certainly a usage or custom in history of our government of 118 years, which has the moral force of a law, to preventing persons from being more than twice elected President. Eight of our Presidents were elected twice, none more than that. Unfortunately for the fame of the great U. S. Grant, he was pursuaded to allow his name to be used for a third nomination by his party, but he failed in the face of his great popularity and reputation, solely because of the usage of rule against the third term. Washington himself persistently refused to be a candidate a third time, and there began the timely and healthy rule against a third Presidential term. Besides all this, our President upon his election in 1904 informed the people absolutely that he would not again be a candidate. Congress and the people accepted this pledge. The people at large will adhere to it, though the maker may wish to withdraw it.

Our wise forefathers in framing our grand old constitution were decidedly opposed to a long term of the presidency. It was fixed at four short years, which was greatly in contrast with the crown or executive term of the English kings of the mother country, whose terms was for life; in several instances for 60 years and over and, ten by descent to the nearest of kin, whether male or female. Is it any wonder these wise men provided for a short term of the Presidency? The Presidency is not hereditary like the English dynasty, nor is it a thing to be given, granted or devised to a favorite, with conditions or promises, attached to be carried out— a "My Policy" arrangement.

No one is more ready than myself to concede to President Roosevelt many high traits of mind and character, brightness, perceptiveness, resourceful, fluency and readiness, but is there not a lack of wisdom, thoughtfulness, reflection and ripeness, in short a lack of statesmanship, of the true American Republican stamp, which should be entirely from any semblance of imperial or monarchial tendency. Let our President be just what the constitution makes him, an executive official; to put into effect such duty as the constitution and laws place upon and not to invade the inclosures of the other departments of our general government.

Our constitution by its articles creates a number of seperate government departments. Purity of character and good intentions are not denied President Roosevelt. It is more his methods, manner and excuses to be complained than his much talked of policies. Even good policies require proper methods to give them useful realities. The President's many angry controversies with individuals, corporations and associations show a temperament at least unbecoming a chief official of a great nation, where the highest civility, courtesy and dignity should always be in use.

There are yet some who remember the exploits of Andrew Johnson, who became President by a great national calamity in traversing the country, iterating and reiterating his wild speeches in which "my policy" was the unvarying subject. These exhibitions were not only disgusting, but offensive to the people and did more in bring on his impeachment than his official act and policy. We know what became of him, and "my policy."

Whatever popularity President Roosevelt may possess, is of special or personal kind, and not of a general character, among the solid thinking people. Those who may wish him a third term are mostly those enjoying his official favors, and others who expect and wish such. But it ought to be remembered, that the "Ins" are inferior in numbers at least to the "Outs," who constitute the masses. The great Republican party with its splendid record of national ideas, measures and principles should be careful and wise in making its next nomination, such a one as the people at large need and want.

This paper has been prepared without any partisan or unfriendly feelings, towards our present chief executive, who, I willingly supported at the elections 1900 and 1904. I recognized his talent, resources and purity of character, then and since, but having the interests and good of the whole people and the great Republican party in mind and heart, I do not and can not believe that he should be nominated for a third term, on any one in his stead for the purpose of carrying out or transmitting his (my) policy. I do not wish in my day to see or aid in the breaking of a rule, old as our national government for the mere purpose of gratifying personal ambition and favoritism.

This paper comes from one, not in practical politics, who has voted at 16 Presidential elections always the same way—in favor of what was believed for the best of all. Another fact, which might by some be considered incredible can be stated, not in vain, I hope, that I have first and last, lived under 21 of our 25 Presidents with a possibility of another, who I wish to be in every way a fit and suitable statesman such as we used to have and still have in reserve. Then let such be chosen, none other, so that our great party and the body of the people too, may be satisfied, and continued. Excessive talkers of each party ought to be avoided.

J. B.

Cumberland, Md., May 8, 1907.

Cheap Farm Lands.

The government is looking for from 500 to 1,000 hardy, industrious farmers to accept farms on a rather novel plan for little or nothing. There are strong efforts being made by the government now to settle up the irrigable west. The call for volunteer farmers is part of this campaign. There is about 75,000 acres of land, good farming land, much of it already under ditch and more being put there on the Ute Indian Reservation. This is the reservation from which a war party of Utes recently broke away and went on a spree through Wyoming and South Dakota. The Indians do not want the land, will not farm it, so the government is willing to rent it out to American farmers at 25 cents per year with the privilege of buying it in fee simple when the Indians to whom it has been allotted die off. The land is a fine altitude, 5,000 feet with a fertile soil and even climate. All temperate zone crops do well, there is an excellent market for everything that can be raised at a good prices. It offers a rather exceptional opportunity for farmers who want to start their boys off in a fine locality at little expense. Details of the plans for apportioning the farms can be had on application from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at Washington.

DRILLING FOR OIL WAS BEGUN LAST SATURDAY

On Tuesday at a Depth of 120 Feet the Tools Stuck and Cable Parted.

Drilling for oil by the Yough River Oil and Gas Company on the farm of Mr. John Harned, five miles west of Oakland, was begun last Saturday after noon and continued until midnight when thirty feet had been completed. The work was resumed Sunday midnight and kept up steadily until Tuesday morning when the drill stuck at a depth of one hundred and twenty feet and the cable to which it was attached parted.

The drillers set to work at once and without ceasing in their labors to recover the tools succeeded in bringing them to the surface Wednesday morning.

At the time drilling commenced it was the intention of drillers to start the work with the new cable which had been shipped with the balance of the machinery but when it was being reeled on by the workmen a defect was found in it and it was reshipped to the factory and another one ordered in its stead. In order not to delay the work any more than possible the hole was started with an old cable which was to be replaced with the new one when it arrives, which is expected at Hutton either today or tomarrow, when the work of drilling will be resumed and pushed forward as fast as possible.

A Call to the Young Men.

The young Men's Christian Literary and Social Society will hold its weekly meeting in the rooms of the society in the Mitchell building on Tuesday evening at 8 oclock. Mr. J. C. Renninger will address the meeting. It is hoped that more of the members of the society will be present than has been in attendance for some weeks past.

Young men, it will take more than a little "froth" of enthusiasm to maintain this organization, and since the business men and others of the town have made such liberal response to our appeal for financial aid, we are in duty bound to uphold the work.

Let us have a full attendance of the membership next Tuesday evening.

J. B. WORKMAN,
Chairman Spiritual Committee.

Graduated as Nurse.

Miss Nannie Miller, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Miller, of Swanton, graduated and received her diploma as a trained nurse from the Hoffman Hospital at Keyser, West Va., on Friday of last week. Miss Miller was one among three who received their diplomas. She is an excellent young lady and her success in the profession she has chosen is assured.

- An - Executioner Corrupted.

By HOWARD FIELDING.

Copyright, 1906, by C. W. Hooke.

I WAS ship's doctor on the Victoria, and Dudley Jarvis was third officer. The steamer had docked about 9 o'clock, and it was nearly noon when I went ashore. As I stepped off the gangplank I saw a hansom cab wherein there sat a very charming girl, Miss Amy Leyland, and my heart leaped at the thought that she had come to greet me after the voyage. The next instant I was aware of Dudley Jarvis, who strode up on the other side of the cab and took Amy by the hand.

I had known Miss Leyland always. I was "a friend of the family." Jarvis was a recent acquaintance.

Had Amy come to see me or Jarvis? I debated that question with myself for full two minutes, while they talked eagerly, then Amy turned and saw me and waved her hand.

"Dick," said she excitedly as I approached, "is it true that poor dog has eaten all those diamonds?"

I stared at her.

"Mr. Jarvis says he has," she went on. "He says that Mr. Stover, the customs inspector, has arrested two men and a dog for smuggling diamonds and that the dog has swallowed them."

"Swallowed whom?" said I. "Is this a joke?"

"No, no; honor bright," said Jarvis. "Didn't the captain tell you about it? Stover told me that the captain had requested you to perform the autopsy."

"The captain said nothing about any dog," I replied.

"This is very interesting," said Miss Leyland. "I want to hear all about it."

Whereupon Jarvis unfolded a wondrous tale. There was a certain man among our passengers who had long been an object of interest to customs detectives on both sides of the Atlantic. He had been pointed out to me during this voyage—a square built, bandy legged Englishman who went by the name of Applebee. This fellow's purchases of diamonds abroad had been reported many times within the last two years, and he had been arrested more than once and was always searched, cross questioned and shadowed whenever he came ashore. But nothing had ever been proved against him, no diamonds had been found in his pockets or his baggage, and (so Jarvis said) the problem of how he got his gems ashore had robbed the customs people of much sleep, especially our captain's particular friend Stover. It was this sapient individual who, according to Jarvis, had worked up the theory of the diamond swallowing dog.

"And it's not Applebee's dog either," said Jarvis. "There's the clever part of it. The brute belongs to another man. Do you remember that artist looking chap with the pointed beard?"

"In 233, Jennison was his name."

"That's the fellow. It seems that he is always abroad when Applebee is and invariably comes home in the same steamer, but they never have a word

"IS IT TRUE THAT POOR DOG HAS EATEN ALL THOSE DIAMONDS?"

to say to each other on board nor ashore either, the detectives say. It's all managed by means of the dog. And this is how it's done. Applebee has a dog, of course, and never travels by any boat that hasn't regular first rate kennels, such as we have on the Victoria. Every time he goes to see his own dog he stops to caress the other fellow's and puts three or four diamonds into the brute's mouth. They've trained the creature so that he won't open his mouth or swallow the diamonds or chew 'em up till Jennison, his master, comes along and takes 'em out. So in the course of the voyage they're all transferred from Applebee to Jennison, and yet the two men have never been within twenty feet of each other. Then at the last moment Jennison feeds the diamonds to the dog in little chunks of meat, and when the poor beast is safe ashore they kill him for the sake of his contents."

"I could swallow the diamonds myself," said I, "a good deal easier than I can swallow this story, and I'd like to know what Stover swallowed before he dreamed it. Somebody must have invented a new drug."

"Oh, no," said Jarvis. "There's no doubt about it."

I turned to Miss Leyland and begged her to wait for me in the hansom.

I gained admittance to the inspectors' room, and, though it was a murky place wherein I could not at first distinguish one man from another, I saw the dog at once. He sat on a mat beside the steam heater, shivering and growling, while a square toed customs bug in a blue pea jacket was holding the beast by a chain.

"Ah, doctor," said this fellow, "here's the pup. Looks pretty sick a'ready, don't you think?"

"Where is Mr. Stover?" I asked, and his chief subordinate replied that he was gone.

"But there's the dog," he added. "You know what's wanted, I suppose?"

"Not exactly," I replied.

"Here's a memorandum," and he gave me a bit of paper on which Stover explicitly demanded the inmost secrets of the unfortunate animal, which was now rubbing his head affectionately against my shins. The report must be ready by 3 o'clock.

I said that I would communicate with Stover before proceeding to extremities, but the subordinate declared that nobody knew where he was.

"I can report right now to you," I began, but the man raised protesting hands.

"I don't know a thing about the case," he said.

With that he took the chain from the other man's hand and put it into mine.

Miss Leyland welcomed the dog with the most affectionate demonstrations.

"Isn't he a beauty!" she exclaimed. "What is his name?"

"His name is Dennis," said I gloomily, reverting to the slang of my boyhood.

"Dennis, Dennis! Come here, Dennis!" she called, but the dog clung the closer to me.

"I must take him aboard ship," said I. "But first I'll put you into your hansom, Amy."

"Indeed you won't," said she, with spirit. "I shall stay and save Dennis."

We went aboard the steamer attended by Jarvis and followed by a customs detective, who evidently had his orders. I led them to my consulting room, and we three entered, while the detective remained outside.

"And now," said Amy when we were seated, "what do you mean to do?"

"What can I do?" said I. "This poor creature has been put into my hands in mercy, so that he may not suffer pain. It was probably done at the captain's suggestion, for he is that sort of man, and he and Stover are great friends."

"But, Dick," protested Amy, "you don't really mean to say that you'll do this awful thing?"

"Suppose I don't do it, Amy," said I as gently as possible. "How will that help the doggie? The captain won't like it. We may have an unpleasant scene, for he's a man who likes to be obeyed. I may even lose my position. And meanwhile Dennis will die just the same."

"But you said yourself that the idea was absurd!" she exclaimed.

"Amy," said I, "there are no more diamonds in our friend's little stomach than there are in my pocket."

"Then why can't you say so?"

"I will when Stover comes," I replied. "And if he is satisfied"—

"He won't be," said Jarvis, who always knows everything. "He'll raise a row, and nothing on earth can save Dennis then. Stover has his theory of this case, and he's the most obstinate mule that ever kicked with all four feet in a bunch."

"You have a glimpse of the man's character," said I, "but you are entirely wrong as to his present opinion. This case is deeper than you think. It is perfectly clear to me that the dog theory is not Stover's. If it were he'd be here to see the thing through. It is the theory of some rival, and Stover wants to make the man ridiculous."

"You've hit it!" cried Jarvis, very much to my surprise, for he is a disputatious animal, yet keen in a way. "And now I'll tell you what we must do. We'll save Dennis yet."

At this Amy gave him such a look of confidence that my spine grew cold.

"Just make your report," continued Jarvis, "'I hereby certify that I have made a thorough examination of the bull terrier, Dennis, and that he contains no diamonds.' Sign your name to it"—

"But, my dear fellow"—

"You know it's true, don't you? You know it'll satisfy Stover? Well, then, what's the objection?"

"Really," said Amy, "I don't see why you can't. It's perfectly true, as Dudley says. And if Mr. Stover already knows it he'll make no fuss, of course."

"Besides," said Jarvis, "Stover 'll find the diamonds anyhow."

"But suppose that I do this crazy thing," said I. "What shall we do with Dennis?"

"I'll take him," cried Amy. "I want him very much."

"You can't get h[illegible] the ship," said I. "There's a d[illegible]ve outside the door now, and [illegible] are plenty more on the pier."

"You could keep him here a few days till just before you sail again," said Amy.

"But somebody would know it," I pleaded.

"Yes, that's too risky," assented Jarvis. "We must get him right out of here, and I'll show you how. Where's that basket?"

And without thought of asking leave he plunged into my inner room, where we heard him pulling things about in frantic haste.

Soon he flew back, and he brought a big covered basket in which I had had some things sent ashore in Liverpool.

"Might have been made to order!" cried Jarvis. "But he's likely to move or bark or something. I'll fix him."

The big overgrown boy (for he is nothing else and never will be) rushed out and was back again the next minute, as it seemed, bearing a large piece of steak wrapped in a newspaper. He fastened the meat securely to the inside of the bottom of the basket and then invited Dennis to dinner. Dennis accepted and promptly became oblivious to all other considerations.

"Now, then," said he, "we'll just tie this cover on." And he suited the action to the words. "So! When you're ready, Miss Leyland, I'll escort you to your carriage, and the doctor will get busy on his report."

I felt as a middle aged man might if he should try to be a boy again and rob an orchard—ten times as much scare for a tenth part of the fun. Yet I wouldn't take a dare. My hand was at the door to open it for Amy, but instead I opened it for Stover.

"Ah, doctor!" he cried. "Great case! Have you got the plunder?"

"My dear fellow," said I, "they weren't there."

Stover's face showed boundless surprise, verging toward consternation.

"You got the dog?"

"Yes."

"And—and"— He glanced at Amy.

"Yes," said I.

He was bewildered.

"But this simply can't be," he finally managed to say. "Look here." And he pulled a sheet of paper from his pocket. "Here's a message that Applebee sent to Horowitz, the man that handles the smuggled diamonds for him. He sent it just before leaving the steamer, 'We bring nothing this trip.' And now look here," producing a small memorandum book containing various sentences written in such a way that I saw at once the thing was a code or cipher key. "'We bring nothing this trip' means 'The diamonds go with the dog.' This is Applebee's cipher book. I got it out of his trunk. But to make the thing surer I myself tracked the messenger that carried Applebee's note, and I nabbed Horowitz while he was reading—nabbed him, by jingo, with his own cipher book in his hand! And here's the book." He pulled it out of another pocket. "What do you say?"

WE PERCEIVED THE ELABORATE TRICKERY OF ITS CONSTRUCTION.

"Can't help it," said I in desperation. "The dog had eaten no diamonds."

Stover laid the palm of his left hand on his forehead, and it seemed to me that I could hear him think.

"What did you do with the dog's collar?" said he.

There was an awful silence, and then Amy said:

"I think Mr. Jarvis carried it to his stateroom with those other things."

"I?" cried Jarvis, turning pale. "Oh, no! I didn't touch it."

"It isn't here," said Stover, flashing keen eyes around the room. "You think he took it, miss?"

"I saw it in his hands," said Amy flatly and truthfully, of course, for Jarvis had had Dennis by the throat quite recently.

"Show me where your stateroom is!" cried Stover as he dragged Jarvis away. "And you hunt here, doctor."

I hunted and so successfully that I was able to place the collar in Stover's hands when he returned pallid and breathless. Dennis and the basket were in my inner room.

With Amy and me the mystery was already clear, for no sooner had we seen the collar off the dog's neck than we perceived some part of the elaborate trickery of its construction. It was a spiked collar, such as is thought becoming to bulldogs, but when Dennis had it on it looked so thin that nobody would think of it as the hiding place even of such small objects as diamonds, but it was rounded underneath most cunningly to deceive the eye, and there were little spring traps communicating with the brass spikes, which were hollow and as thin as paper. From these receptacles Stover took fourteen diamonds and seven rubies, some of them very fine stones exceeding five carats in weight.

And when it was all over Amy and I rode uptown together, with Dennis in the basket, and Jarvis stayed aboard the ship and wished that he had never been born.

ADVISE SELLING OUT.

An Unusually Frank Statement of Failure by a Board of Public Service.

In an exhaustive report to the city council the board of public service of Bellefontaine, O., recommended the selling of the municipal gas plant on the following grounds:

"The gas plant is no longer necessary to and does not furnish any public service.

"The mains in the principal streets are very old and will require in the future expensive repairs.

"The plant is in as good condition today as it is possible to put the present system, and to change the system will require another bond issue.

"The average price received from the sale of gas is very little if any lower than a private corporation would give to our people, but is as low as any governing board the people may elect can make and keep the plant in its present condition and meet all the requirements and pay bonds and interest, as has been the policy of the present management.

"Four years ago it was necessary to issue $15,000 of bonds to build a new holder and install coal gas bench and necessary machinery, and another issue of bonds to the extent of $12,000 to pay overdrafts in the banks, and $5,000 more to put new mains in Sandusky street before it was paved. These bond issues should have been unnecessary if the plant had been operated with a view of self support, but gas was being furnished part of our citizens for much less than cost, and the remaining citizens, even if they did not use gas, were compelled to stand a bond issue for which each taxpayer became equally responsible to get the plant on its feet. And, as history repeats itself, you will find a request in the future, as in the past, for bonds to keep the plant in condition if the price of gas is lowered, and we wish to say in this connection that with the election for members of this board almost a year in advance there are candidates who are grooming themselves today with a view of catching popular favor and riding into office on the promise of cheaper gas, and if elected on that issue and their promises and pledges are carried out you may expect a request for a bond issue, and when we realize that we are now bonded to our legal limit, how will the money be furnished? And if the plant is permitted to get in the condition it was in four years ago, what would it be worth if compelled to sell it?

"Is it right or just to tax those people who do not use gas to keep up this plant, either by taxes or bond issues, when they derive no service, either personally or as citizens from public service, from the plant? Is it right to tax any citizen to keep up something that gives him no return as a taxpayer? And, on the other hand, is it right to compel the gas consumer to build up a plant from revenues derived from the sale of gas for the people? As the people own this plant, would it not be more equitable to all the people to dispose of the plant and with the proceeds furnish a necessity by installing water mains and sewerage accommodation for all citizens? This, in our opinion, should find favor from both factions, both of whom at present have just cause for complaint."

SEVENTEEN PER CENT A YEAR.

Depreciation of the Electric Plant In a Minnesota Town—Interesting Holdup.

The burning down of the municipal electric light plant of East Grand Forks, Minn., has probably settled the question of its abandonment, which was under discussion prior to the fire. A well informed correspondent writes that "the plant has furnished a somewhat indifferent service and did not earn enough to pay the fuel and labor accounts, to say nothing about interest on investment, depreciation, etc.," in spite of its charging private customers $120 a year for 1,200 c. p. arcs on moonlight schedule.

As East Grand Forks is a border town and right across the line in North Dakota (a prohibition state) is the city of Grand Forks, about 90 per cent of the business houses in East Grand Forks are saloons. Many of these got their electric lights from a private company in Grand Forks, because the service was better and the price lower, until the council passed a resolution to the effect that no saloon would be licensed unless it patronized the municipal plant.

There is a curious discrepancy between the various reports as to the value of the plant. In January the city authorities reported that the plant had cost $32,000. Three months later they estimated the fire loss at $10,000, although we understand that the plant is entirely destroyed, and adjusted the loss at $5,000, the plant having been insured for $8,400. As it was installed in 1902, it looks as though the depreciation amounted to 84 per cent in five years, or 17 per cent a year. The plant will probably not be rebuilt.

Medford's Plant Out of Date.

F. H. Farrar, superintendent of the city electric light plant, states that the plant is out of date and practically useless. According to his statement, the plant is worth about $10,000, and it would require an expenditure of $15,000 to make it serviceable, while a new plant would cost about $20,000. The majority of the council favor the employment of an electrical expert to make a thorough examination of the plant and report on the same.—Electrical World.

The country has learned that after the tumult and the shouting of a popular election cry comes the still small voice of a treasury deficit, to be made good by increased taxes. — Trenton (N. J.) Times.

The Ending of the World.

By CAMILLE FLAMMARION, Noted Astronomer.

IN a comparatively few years, astronomically speaking, this beautiful planet upon which we live, so full of life today, so full of activity, so noisy, so rich, on whose surface generations succeed generations so rapidly, will be dead—more, DESTROYED.

Just as she conceals in her bosom today the elements and dates of her beginnings, so she contains there the germs of her DECADENCE and end.

And not only she, but her companions also—Venus, her younger sister, who resembles her so closely and whose present humanity is undoubtedly centuries behind our present stage of progress; Mercury, fiery and swift; Jupiter, now pursuing his course with noble and majestic movement; Saturn, girdled with his triple ring and guarded by his eight satellites; Uranus, slow and venerable; Neptune, whose years are centuries—ALL THESE WORLDS WILL SHORTLY HAVE CEASED TO EXIST.

Inside an infinitely small fraction of eternity they will have lost all heat, water, air, liquids, gases, cohesion, affinity—all the elements of existence AND OF LIFE will have disappeared.

The spots on the sun, which are even now scaring many people, will have increased in number, and this great luminary will have been EXHAUSTED OF ITS HEAT by its long radiation into space.

At first these spots will be seen to spread themselves like two dark zones on either side of the equator of the sun, and meteorologists will observe a sensible diminution in its heat and light.

When millions of centuries shall have passed, this loss of heat will have become so great that ALL ORGANISMS on the planets will perish to give place to new beings constituted to live in the cold.

But an age will come when the sun, first growing dark red, then obscure, will cease to be the source of heat to the family of planets which have so long drawn from it their magnetism AND THEIR LIFE and will shed only a livid and sinister light.

The days shall be turned into nights, and there will be no longer either spring or summer. The worlds, dark and heavy, will revolve like black balls around another black ball.

THE HEAVENS WILL HAVE BECOME UNRECOGNIZABLE. THE EARTH DECREPIT, DRIED UP, DISINTEGRATED, WILL HAVE FALLEN INTO FRAGMENTS WHICH, SPREADING THEMSELVES ALONG HER ORBIT, WILL CONTINUE TO REVOLVE AROUND THE DEAD SUN.

Diminutive skeletons revolving around a giant skeleton, aerolites carrying into darkness the last fragments of a formerly inhabited earth, they will perhaps be enveloped in its passage by some hyperbolic comet which, carrying some of them with it in its course, will scatter them IN ANOTHER SYSTEM on some unknown planet, whose inhabitants, gathering them up to preserve them under glass in a museum of curiosities, will analyze them without finding in them any clew to the history of the past—to be from whence they came.

The Evil Effects of Wall Street Panics.

By Representative PHILIP P. CAMPBELL of Kansas.

EVERY business man realizes that the prosperity of the country is threatened by the panics in Wall street due to the manipulation of STOCK GAMBLERS. The hue and cry that is raised every time there is a slump in the stock market causes a feeling of apprehension that makes capital timid and thus DISTURBS THE GENERAL BUSINESS SITUATION. It is in this way that such panics become a positive menace to the COUNTRY'S welfare. I shall go over the interstate acts for the purpose of ascertaining if there is not some law that will put an end to tremendous gambling operations in New York. It seems to me there ought to be legislation that will prevent stock operators from gambling in the SECURITIES OF COMMON CARRIERS that transport interstate commerce.

I do not know that there is any such law, and if not congress should enact one. If the situation cannot be reached entirely by the federal government congress should CO-OPERATE WITH THE STATES in reaching it.

STATE LEGISLATURES CAN ENACT LEGISLATION THAT WILL PREVENT THE MAINTENANCE OF PLACES WHERE PEOPLE CAN BUY AND SELL STOCKS ON MARGINS.

Lynching Must Be Stopped.

By Ex-Governor W. J. NORTHEN of Georgia.

THE white people hate the negroes, and the negroes hate the white people. There is a DEEP GRAINED ANTAGONISM between the two races, and where the negro is concerned the white people are all ready to cry, with Ben Tillman, "To hades with the law!"

This spirit is alive IN THE COURTS. I recently wrote to members of the supreme court asking if they did not consider lynching nothing less than murder. I failed to get an answer, and it was the same way with regard to the sheriffs.

In response to another letter I received an insulting reply from a minister.

I believe every one of a mob A RED HANDED MURDERER, whether he be the tail end member or a leader, and it is my opinion that all people connected with a lynching, whether they be only onlookers or not, should be sentenced to the PENITENTIARY.

I consider people who burn negroes as SAVAGES. Many are trying to belittle this great question. It is greater than ALL THE OTHER PROBLEMS combined.

JUST NOW WE ARE LAPSING INTO BARBARISM, AND OUR CIVILIZATION IS SLIPPING FROM US. SOMETHING MUST BE DONE.

SHEEP AND WOLVES.

Forsaking his wife; breaking up his home; eloping with 17-year-old school girl who was his ward; deposed by the bishop of his diocese because of the immorality of his conduct and the unspeakable reproach he brought upon the cause of the christian ministry—such is the record of a single week that stands against Rev (!) Jere K. Cooke of Hempstead, Long Island, New York.

It is sad to have to chronicle such lapses from moral rectitude by those who have borne the sacred title of minister of the gospel; and all the sadder because of the glee with which such cases are seized upon by scoffers and unbelievers and spread broadcast to the detriment of churches and the cause of righteousness.

When one bank official goes wrong, the whole public talks about it, yet little is heard of the great army of back officials who are above suspicion and who stand as the impregnable buttress in behalf of business confidence and integrity. So likewise when one minister falls the world makes much of it without seeming to stop to consider the multitude of faithful ministers whose lives are devoted unselfishly and spotlessly to the ministry of reconciliation. He in whose name they preach warned them when on earth that false teachers would come and wolves would wear sheeps clothing, and this prophecy has alas, been all too often fulfilled. Even among the Twelve there was one traitor, but it should be a reassuring thought that where one was faithless eleven were faithful, and so, in these days, where there is an occasional successor to Judas how much better it is to think of the vast multitude who stand steadfast for truth, sincerity and righteousness. There would be no counterfeit but for the existence of the genuine.

MARYLAND.

The Washington Star, of Wednesday, under the above caption, refers to the municipal election held in Baltimore on Tuesday last as follows: Mr. Mahool's victory in Baltimore yesterday did not come up to his party's expectations. The predicted majority of twenty thousand did not materialize. Had that figure, or one approaching it, been reached, there would have been good grounds for marking Maryland off the debatable state for next fall, and probably for next year. So pronounced a result in the metropolis of the state would have assured Democratic success in the gubernatorial race, and even made the outlook bright for Mr. Bryan in the national race. But the majority secured is only a third of the one expected, and as explained it shows that the spirit of independent voting is still strong in the Maryland city. Mr. Timanus lost in the Watchter wards as the result of Republican factional discontent, and ran well in Democratic wards as the result of his excellent official record. The state race is to follow, and in Gov. Warfield the Democrats have a strong man, both in his personality and in his official record. But there are differences to be composed. The new party manager is ex-Gov. Brown, and while he has public spirit and party pride and all that sort of thing, he has a personal ambition. What does he want for himself, and what will be his plan for obtaining it? How soon does he think he is due to arrive in the United States Senate? If Gov. Warfield stands for a second term the Republicans should inspect their aspirants for governor under a strong glass. They will need the best man in the list. They have excellent material, and with a candidate will selected and well supported should give their opponents a run for their money. As for next year, it is extremely doubtful now if Mr. Bryan, upon any platform which will insure him his former strength in his old strongholds, will be able to carry Maryland as against any of the men figuring prominently in the Republican speculation. What Mr. Gorman and Mr. Rasin, working together, could not accomplish, Gov. Brown will find beyond his power. On the great national questions—money, the tariff, the curbing of corporate greed, and the proper support of the country the business interests of Maryland and particularly those of so flourishing a city as Baltimore, are not to be manipulated, as once, by a mere party tag, or cry. The general welfare is their welfare, they examine issues for themselves, leaving spellbinders to harangue the idle and the curious in any old way for votes.

Let's Talk It Over, Anyhow.

A friend from a western town writes:

"We can trace at least a thousand increase of population the past year from the fact that the fifty-four members of our Commercial Club about a year ago all agreed to have printed on the back of their business letterheads a description of the town, its location, climate, natural advantages, possibilities for business, etc. Thus every letter they wrote was an advertisement for the town. The town booming matter was artistically printed, and the catch line being visible as the folded sheet was taken from the envelope, few persons failed to read it. Inquiries for more information came pouring in, and then the people came pouring in. Why don't you try to have your people do likewise?"

Now that looks like a sensible proposition. Suppose fifty of our citizens should have their stationery printed with such matter on the back! Say they will average a thousand letters a year. That would be fifty thousand little booms for the town, going out to all quarters of the compass.

One of these letters might strike the eye of just the right party and bring us a new factory, an educational institution, or even a good substantial family looking for a desirable home place.

It is worth trying.

We can get up the descriptive matter for you and do the printing.

Why don't you start the ball?

LET'S TALK IT OVER, ANYHOW.

FAILED TO SELL OLD JAIL.

Highest Bid for Property Was $1000, and Refused by Commissioners.

Yesterday afternoon in front of the court house the County Commissioners offered at public auction two pieces of county property—the old jail and lot having a frontage of eighty feet on Green street and running back 125 feet to an alley in the rear, and the lot purchased a few years ago as a site for the new jail which is located on the opposite side of Fifth street from the old jail property, and succeeded in disposing of neither, the bids being deemed inadequate by the Commissioners.

The old jail was first offered and was started at $500 by Mr. W. A. Maffett, who had as his competitor County Treasurer Horace R. DeWitt, the former making the highest bid—$1000—when the property was withdrawn from the sale by the Commissioners, who, it is understood, had placed a value of $2000 upon it, which, in consideration at which other property in Oakland is selling at present, is not in excess of its true worth.

The vacant lot across Fifth street from the old jail was then offered and withdrawn after a bid of $225 had been made for it by Mr. Maffett. This lot cost the county $300, but it was damaged to some extent by the removal of large quantities of earth which was used for grading purposes around the new jail. As it is, however, the lot is still valuable for building purposes.

In Memoriam.

Caroline Elizabeth Myers, was born August 10th, 1836, and died May 1st, 1907, aged 70 years, 8 months and 21 days. She leaves a husband, two sons and five daughters to mourn their loss. Mrs. Lohr and Mrs. Manear, near home; Simon and the youngest daughter at home, Henry C., at Braucher, W. Va., Mrs. Bow, of Crellin, and Mrs. W. P. Durst, of Preston, Filmore county, Minn. Mother Myers suffered for 30 years from that distressing disease, asthma. The cause of her death was dropsy. She told her family she was ready and willing to go at the Master's call. Her remains were laid to rest in the family grave-yard on the home farm. The services were conducted by her pastor, Rev. E. Manges. Prof. Groves was present with a choir and sang beautifully "Jesus Lover of My soul," and "When the Roll is Called up Yonder." Prof. Groves sang a solo, "The Vacant Chair."

HER PASTOR.

Hand Seriously Injured.

Bruce Browning, employed as sawyer on the mill located near Hutton and owned by Mr. Charles F. White, sustained an injury to his right hand last Friday morning which might have resulted in the loss of that member. In some manner his hand came in contact with the revolving saw and lacreated it very seriously. The wounds were dressed by Dr. McComas, who chanced to be at Hutton when the accident occurred.

TO SAFEGUARD MINERS LIVES

Government Experts Are To Take Up the Matter.

WASHINGTON, May 14.—Determined endeavors to stop the appalling sacrifice of human lives in the coal mines of the United States are to be made at once by the fuel division of the Geological Survey, thus supplementing its efforts to lessen the waste of fuel in mining operations.

Plans have been drawn for a unique experimental station, at which tests of the various dynamites and powers used in blasting coal will be made, with a view to accurately determine their safety in the presence of the deadly firedamp and, perhaps equally deadly coal gas. Explosions of all sorts will be hurled by means of a mortar into a mammoth boiler-plate cylinder which has previously been filled with gas, and effects will be carefully noted. If ignition fails after severe test, the explosives will be known as "permissible explosives," and their use will be urged upon the mineowners of the country.

In addition, there will be important experiments in rescue work. One part of a station will be fitted up as a miniature coal mine, and miners and operators will be taught the noble art of saving the lives of fellowmen. It is declared that in serious explosions in mines hundreds of lives could be saved were it possible for the rescue party to enter immediately after the accidents. As it is now, the deadly firedamp often holds the men back for hours, while their comrades are slowly being suffocated or burned to death.

In their investigations so far the government experts have found an apparatus in Europe which, when worn by the members of a rescue party, enables them to enter any place where there is gas. At the experimental station the miniature mine will be filled with dense smoke, and practical demonstrations in the saving of life with this apparatus will be made.

A definite location for the experimental station has not yet been selected, but it is probable that the station will be in the Pittsburg district

"We intend to begin the erection of this station within a few weeks," said J. A. Holmes, chief of the technologic branch of the Geological Survey. "There seems to be no end to the gas and coal dust explosions in mines. Instead of growing less, these horrors appear to be multiplying. On the first of this month 21 men lost their lives in the Whipple Mine, in Fayette county, W. Va., by an explosion of gas. This gives West Virginia a record of 103 lives lost in mine explosions during the first month of this year. On January 28, 82 men were killed in the Stuart Mine, also in Fayette county.

"In 1906 the coal-mine death roll in Pennsylvania was 500. Two hundred and fifty died as the result of gas or dust explosions. The others were the victims of accidents. We believe that this tremendous loss of life is unnecessary, and it will be our purpose to investigate the subject in a most thorough and practical manner. We shall not be satisfied until we have reduced these accidents in coal mines to a minimum.

"From our investigations so far, the United States is behind Europe in safeguarding the lives of the men in the mines. England and Belgium have had for years splendid experimental stations, and in these countries there are but few casualties in the mines. The Belgium mines are notorious for the presence of fire damp, yet that country has enjoyed a wonderful immunity from these terrible explosions.

"As a result of the experiments in England there are a number of permissible explosives, and these must be used by the miners in the blasting of coal, and no others. They have also in England what is known as the 'limit charge,' which must not be exceeded on pain of severe penalty.

Price Of Wheat Is Soaring.

The rise of December wheat in Chicago to $1.03 a bushel, like the recent rise in cotton, is a consequence, of course, of the continued cold weather. Winter has lingered entirely too long in the lap of Spring, and even seems disposed to flirt with Summer. There are reports of damage to crops in the West and Southwest, while in the Northwest far up into Canada, freezing weather has lasted unusually long. The probable yield of winter wheat has thus been largely reduced and the sowing of spring wheat delayed and in some regions perhaps prevented. The area in wheat is reduced as well as the yield. Under such conditions a speculative raise is to be expected, to the advantage of those who retain part of last year's crop. Consumers hope it will yet change for the better. With everything else so dear, a large enhancement of the price of the staff of life will entail hardship upon the masses of the people.

Billy Jones wrote on the backboard, "Billy Jones can hug the girls better than any boy in the school." The teacher seeing it, calling him up. "William, did you write that?" she said. The children waited for Billy to come out, when they began to guy him. "Got a lickin', didn't you?" "No," said Bill. "Get jawed?" "No." "What did she do?" they asked. "Shan't tell," said Bill, "but it pays to advertise."

Are we going to be a race of stoop-shouldered men? One would naturally think so to look over almost any large crowd, walk down any crowded street, or glance at the average male human being he meets. The man who walks with his head erect, his shoulders thrown back and his chest extended just as nature intended he should, is a rarity and is remarked about wherever he goes. The average man, and more's the pity, the average young man, walks as if he were very tired.

John E. Beatty, ticket supply clerk, and C. H. Poumairat, auditor of passenger receipts, B. and O., came to Oakland on No. 3 train last Sunday. Mr. Beatty has been a frequent visitor to Oakland but Mr. Poumairat has yet to become fully acquainted with the delightful and invigorating climate of the Alleghanies. Mr. Poumairat, as auditor of passengers receipts, has a very large force of clerks in his department, his office occupying an entire floor of the B. and O. building. His Sunday visit to Oakland was for the purpose of securing accommodations for his family for the summer.

Say, do you know the kind of fellow who's just to the world's mind? The kind the world can't lose? The kind that folks enthuse over and take off their hats to? Why it's the man-who-does. He's the fellow! Not the fellow whose grandpa got there; not the fellow who would if he could; not the gentleman who's going to some day; but the man-who-does, now, today. No sitting around waiting, about him; no expecting something to happen; no looking for something to turn up. No sir! He calls the turn and turns 'em; he takes off his coat and doesn't care if he starts a little sweat; he doesn't need a big, brass-buttoned copper to tell him to move on; he keeps the procession humping to keep up with him; he is hustle from his feet up and from his head down; he is not in the push, but he is the push—the whole thing; and say the way he makes things come and business hum is a caution; the way the world takes that fellow up and is good to him makes your heart glad; he's all right, he is; he greases the wheels of progress and keeps the world spinning around.

OLD STORY OF C. & O. EXTENSION RESURRECTED

Annual Story of the Proposed Building of Railroad from Kendall to Oakland

The annual, or semi-annual, story of the extension of the Confluence and Oakland Railroad from Kendall, its present terminus, to Oakland, has been resurrected, this time the story appearing in the Pittsburg Post of Sunday, the 12th inst., and extensively copied by the daily press in all sections of the conntry.

The people of Oakland and Garrett county generally have been hearing for many years of the contemplated building of the link of track between this point and Kendall until with each recurring year they look forward to a rehashing of the story, yet they are not at all disheartened. The Republican believes that in time the road will be built, but not this year.

In conversation Tuesday afternoon with Mr. S. A. Kendall, the head of the Kendall interests in this section of the country, The Republican was given assurances by Mr. Kendall that the story appearing in the Post was unfounded, nevertheless we publish the Post's article, which is as follows:

"Negotiations have been opened by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company with the Kendall Lumber Company for the purchase of the latter's narrow gauge line extending north from Mountain Lake Park. This line will be rebuilt and the Baltimore & Ohio will then have a new direct line from Confluence, on the main line, to Mountain Lake Park, on the Baltimore & Ohio Sowthwestern. While there has been talk of building such a cut-off for some years it is now authoritatively stated that the railroad company intends to take the work up in earnest.

"The Baltimore & Ohio now has a line from Confluence to Kendall, about 20 miles, and the distance from Kendall to Mountain Lake Park is also about 20 miles. The rebuilding of the narrow gauge lumber road will give the Baltimore & Ohio almost a direct line from Pittsburgh to Mountain Lake Park, a popular summer resort.

"At present passenger trains are run from here to Cumberland, 150 miles, and from there to Mountain Lake Park, 51 miles, making a total distance of 201 miles. When the proposed cut-off is built trains will be run from Pittsburgh to Confluence, 185 miles, and about 40 miles from there to Mountain Lake Park. In addition to this roundabout way passengers usually have a long wait at Cumberland to make connections. Freight traffic has also increased and the proposed cut-off will greatly benefit shippers in the Pittsburgh district.

"Some years ago the Kendall Lumber Company built a narrow gauge line north from Mountain Lake Park to develop the timber in that district. The greater portion of the timber has been cut. Baltimore & Ohio engineers are said to have completed surveys for the proposed connecting link. Improvements to the line from Confluence to Kendall will also be necessary before the short line is placed in service."

The forests are undergoing their annual kaleidoscopic change from the somber brown of winter to the lively green of "the good old summer time." As this recurring miracle is performed before our eyes we see all the great changing colors manufacturd in the great laboratory of Nature. Here is the brown of twig and trunk, the gray of the swelling bud, the yellow, red, purple, white, pink and blue of the early flowers; there is the olive green of the opening leaves and a thousand varying shades of all these blending colors intermingled and mixed in a way no human hand has ever yet successfully imitated. Truly the springtime is a season worth studying.

Mr. Thomas J. Peddicord of Oakland, who is the nestor of the Garrett county bar, represented the attorneys of Garrett county at the initial session of the United States court for the Western District of Maryland which convened in the Federal building in Cumberland on Monday of this week with His Honor Judge Thomas J. Morris, of Baltimore, presiding. Mr. Peddicord, on behalf of the local members of the bar, addressed the Court in a short speech, congratulating the bar and people upon the fact that hereafter matters coming under jurisdiction of the Court which originate in Western Maryland can be determined in Cumberland and obviate the necessity of litigants and witnesses making the expensive trip to Baltimore where the Court was formerly convened for the entire State. Mr. Peddicord, along with many Allegany county members of the bar, was admitted to practice before the Court and succeeded in having a number of cases docketed for trial in Baltimore, removed to Cumberland, among the cases removed being several instituted by Mrs. Elizabeth Cecil who is seeking to dispossess farmers of Garrett county who have been exercising ownership over their land for twenty to forty years.

MEMORIAL DAY IN OAKLAND.

Annual Decoration of the Graves of the Honored Dead.

Crook Post No. 35, Grand Army of the Republic, desires that there be a general turnout of the citizens, public school children and all organized bodies of the town, and visitors from the surrounding country are also invited to participate with the Post on Memorial Day, Thursday, May 30th, in decorating the graves of the noble dead who have answered the last roll call and are now resting in our cemeteries. An old comrade will deliver an address.

Crook Post will assemble at Sturgiss' Hall at 10.30 o'clock and proceed to the cemetery where the beautiful ritual of the order will be carried out.

Donations of flowers will be thankfully received and can be left at Sturgiss' drug store.

By order of the Post.

Letter to Rev. J. B. Workman,

Oakland, Md.

Rev. Sir: We should like to ask your advcie on a certain thing done; was it right or wrong? We shall have to state it, including the names.

D F Dreicorn is a painter in Holyoke, Mass. John J Donohue is an architect, Springfield, near-by.

Donohue was building, at Holyoke, the Holy Family Institute, letting the work by bids, as usual. Dreicorn got the paint job; the paint was to be lead-and-oil.

But Dreicorn said to himself: "lead-and-oil isn't half as good as Devoe and it costs more money, what shall I do?" He painted Devoe; and after the work was done, told Donohue, saying: "if that isn't better than any lead-and-oil job, I'll make it so."

Was Dreicorn right or wrong in painting a lead-and-oil job Devoe.

You ask how it turned-out. This was six years ago. Now Donohue has another job there, a big addition to the Catholic Hospital; and he doesn't ask bids for the painting, but says the Dreicorn: "Go ahead Dreicorn and give me as good a job as you did on the Institute. That's the best paint job I ever saw.

The question is "Was Dreicorn right in painting Devoe when he had agreed to paint lead-and-oil?"

That isn't quite all. Lead-and-oil is expected to last three years. If Dreicorn had used lead-and-oil, there would have been another job for him or somebodyelse three years ago.

Was he right in losing that job for himself or somebody-else three years ago?

The Institute took 200 gallons Devoe and cost $1,600; the paint has worn six years, when Donohue says "it's the best paint job he ever saw." If he had used lead-and-oil, it would have cost about $2,200 for the two paint jobs (six and three years ago) and be hungry for paint again.

Dreicorn lost $1200 of business and took the risk of making Donohue mad and losing his business, forever; all to save the Holy Family Institute $1200 besides the fuss of a paint job.

Was Dreicorn right or wrong as a painter; and which would you paint your church, lead-and-oil or Devoe.

Yours truly,

26 F. W. Devoe & Co.

Communicated.

To the Editor of The Republican.

Seeing a news item of the election held here last week in an Oakland paper I wish to say that the item was erroneous when it states that there was a triumphant election held.

The true facts are that there was but one little ticket in the field and at the end of the counting of the ballots there were but nine cast—six candidates running for office and three judges of election, so you see it was a game of you tag me and I will tag you.

R. C. Holbrook.

WILL LOSE HIS FOOT.

"Jack" McRobie Mangled by a Freight Train In Oakland Saturday.

"Jack" McRobie, a young man of about nineteen years of age, residing with his parents in the Glades Hotel cottage, fell under a moving east bound freight train at the station in Oakland last Friday at noon and besides sustaining numerous minor injuries to his hand and head, his right foot was so horribly crushed that amputation of that member will be made by Dr. McComas, who had hopes of saving the foot but it has become apparent that this cannot be done. Young McRobie was employed by the railroad company as a section hand and was off duty when the accident took place.

Gillespie Denied New Trial.

The court overruled the motion made by C. D. Gillespie to set aside the verdict of the jury herein, and handed down a written opinion, which was filed with the papers of this case. The judgment was entered that the plaintiff Deannah J. Pennigton, recover from the defendant, C. D. Gillespie, the sum of $5,500 the amount awarded by the jury with interest from the 16th day of March 1907. To the action and ruling of the court in overruling said motion, the defendant excepted, and on his motion he was give 30 days to prepare and have signed a proper bill or bills of exception, and on his further motion the execution of this judgment is stayed for a period of 60 days, to enable him to apply to the supreme court of appeals of this state for a writ of error herein. The written opinion rendered by Judge Reynolds was very lengthy and showed considerable time in its preparation. In view of Jack Pennington's earning capacity and the expectancy of his natural life the Judge thought the jury acted fairly in the case. Pennington, while intoxicated was killed by a train. It is alleged that he procurred liquor at Gillespie's place after being notified by Mrs. Pennington not to sell him, her husband.—Parsons Advocate.

MR. BRYAN SIZED UP.

The New York Sun of Sunday gives its estimate of Mr. William Jennings Bryan based upon a paragraph in a letter from a Massachusetts gentleman to the Springfield Republican, in which he expresses disappointment in Mr. Bryan as a public speaker. He was prepared to hear an eloquent speech, such as Wendell Phillips or Charles Summers of treasured memory would have made, and he expected Mr. Bryan to justify his support of him for President. The Sun draws its readers close to the canvas to scan its wonderfully correct word picture of "The Great Commoner." "Mr. Bryan," says the Sun, "looked well and sounded well, but his diction was slipshod and there was something wanting in the great man. The New England conscience was troubled. Why did the real limp so far behind the ideal? Seeking to comprehend the slump in Presidential values, the Massachusetts man says in a candid letter to the Springfield Republican:" 'Perhaps it was, and I am still puzzling over it, a little sense of inadequacy—a fear that in dealing with governmental problems he he might not be able to work out the right results, although he states them with decision—a little suspicion that he does not idealize the common people enough, but stoops to conquer.' 'The last part of this analysis has nothing to do with the first part and is besides obscure, since the common people are all eagles, none of them crows, and every ballot marker a statesman and sovereign in his own right in Mr. Bryan's popular orations, which is all the idealization that can reasonably be required. But the Massachusetts man is very 'warm,' as the children say, when he gropes after Mr. Bryan's fitness to administer the Government and make reform a vital force. Mr. Bryan has had no executive experience and has never given the slightest proof that he is a man of affairs. His knowledge of the structure and functions of the American system of government is not philosophical. Who ever heard him argue to the heart of a constitutional question, or use any but familiar maxims and trite phrases in dealing with government policy? No one would think of consulting Mr. Bryan on international law. As a member of Congress he showed no aptitude for legislation. He made orations on the tariff and was melodious and showy, but was not on speaking terms with schedules. He sounded well and was good to look at. He has never gone beneath the skin of a public question, although he has talked more than any man of his time. He never acquired the first principles of finance, and probably never digested a statistical report. Traditions, sentiment, party principles, the obvious moralities and policies borrowed from the Populists have been Mr. Bryan's stock in trade. He has originated nothing, illuminated no problem, and has not been intellectual. The tolerance of Mr. Bryan as a leader, teacher and prophet is not a reflection upon the intelligence of the American people, but a proof of their inexhaustible good nature. If would be a reflection upon Mr. Bryan's intelligence to suppose that he takes himself as seriously as some of his admirers do. He must often wonder why he is allowed to capitalize the commonplace with out challenge, and derive an unfailing income from it. Mr. Bryan is essentially a talker—a phonograph full of the records of universal and common thought—and not a solver of problems; a facile promiser of reforms which other men attempt to carry out in travail. His administrative capacity must be doubted gravely by those who recognize his personal charm and want to do him justice, because he talks too much to think deeply.

Our Massachusetts friend has been hypnotized like thousands of his fellow countrymen by a voice and a presence; there is neither wisdom nor force behind them. Mr. Bryan is likely to disappoint any supporter who has the courage to submit him to the comparative test, even as an orator.

STORIES OF GENERAL ULYSSES S. GRANT.

His Generalship and That of His Adversary, Lee, Compared.

The fame of Grant must be forever coupled with the name of Lee, whose defeat he accomplished and who was his greatest adversary. Indeed, writers of as wide information as Theodore Roosevelt have not hesitated to say that Lee was the greater soldier. Whatever may be the judgment of history as to the relative merits of the two great commanders, Grant was the victor in the campaign of 1864-1865 and his victory ended civil war in the United States. While the methods of Grant and Lee were radically different, each of them "knew his man," and was able often to calculate to a nicety what the other was about to do. To illustrate this quality as possessed by Grant, one turns to the story of Cold Harbor. At Cold Harbor Grant did not know how strongly the confederates were entrenched or he would never have ordered the attack. But he did know what to expect of Lee if Lee had the men.

Dr. Lawson, a man too old to be in the army, was Gen. Grant's host by force of circumstances, on the morning of the battle. Gen. Grant recognized him as a non-combatant although knowing his sympathies to be with the confederacy. The battle of Cold Harbor fought June 3, 1864, as an early morning affair and the bloodiest of the entire war for the two or three hours it lasted. Richmond, the objective point of Grant's army, and of the hopes of the north, was only six miles away. Just as dawn was breaking Gen. Grant was standing with a group of officers with his back against a tree. Dr. Lawson was standing near. Grant took out his watch. "If I don't hear his guns in ten minutes, Richmond is ours," he said. Dr. Lawson took out his watch also. Grant waited and watched the moving hands. One minute—two minutes—three—four—five—six—and then the gate of hell were opened as Lee's artillery replied to the silent challenge of the silent commander.

"I'm checked again," said Grant, and returned his watch to his pocket. He seemed to know in a minute that his plan would not be successful. The battle was stopped before the morning was half over, but 10,000 or 12,000 boys in blue were left on the field. It meant that Grant would have to wait almost a year for the evacuation and fall of the capital of the cofederacy. But to let old Dr. Lawson draw his conclusions: "I knew that I stood in the presence of a great general—the equal of our own Lee. When two men commanding great armies can so play the game that a margin of ten minutes time means victory or defeat, it proves that each army is captained by a genius of war."

Gen. Grant was a soldier through and through, although the army was not his over powering ambition from his boyhood, for he protested against going to West Point when his father told him he had secured an appointment. After his service in the Mexican war, and in the far west, resigned from the the army because his salary was not large enough to enable him to support his wife and two children. When the civil war came on, Grant's first application to Washington for a colonelcy was not considered important enough to merit reply. At that very time at a council of southern military leaders in Richmond, Gen. Beauregard said: "There is one West Pointer whom I hope the northern people will not find out; I mean 'Sam' Grant. I knew him well at West Point and in Mexico. He is clear-headed, quick, and daring."

Grant was given command of an Illinois regiment and his first campaign was that against Col. Thomas Harris and his confederate regiment in Missouri in the summer of 1861. As Grant led his men to the brow of the hill behind which Harris had been in camp, he said his heart went higher and higher in his throat and he would have given anything to be back in Illinois. He had seen service in the field, and would not have cared had some other officer been in command, but the responsibility of heading the attack weighed on him. When the hill was cleared and he found that Harris had been even more frightened and had fled—then Grant found himself. The surrender of Fort Donelson, the action at Shiloh, the siege and capture of Vicksburg, following his first triumph of military diplomacy over Gen. Leonidas Polk in western Kentucky—these things brought the eyes of the world to center on Gen. Grant and Lincoln and congress placed him in command as lieutenant general.

After the terrific fighting in the Wilderness, where Grant gained no signal advantage, Lee and his generals were in council. They expected Grant to retreat upon Washington, as the federal generals had done before, under like circumstances. An aide-de-camp came up and reported: "The enemy is moving by his left flank toward Richmond!" Gen. Lee exclaimed: "To your posts. The order is to move by our right flank. The union army has at last found a general." Grant was then writing his famous message to Washington, ending with: "I propose to fight it out on this line if it takes all summer."

When it had all come to an end and Grant had brought Lee to a position where he could do nothing but give up the struggle, the federal commander was exultant when he received Lee's letter asking for a conference. But when he came to Appomattox and the two men talked for a long time over days in the old army before the war, Grant was sad and depressed. He says of that famous interview: "I felt like anything, rather than rejoicing at the downfall of a foe who had fought so long and valiantly, and who had suffered so much for a cause."

It was at this interview at Appomattox that Grant was to complete his victory over the south by capturing the hearts of the people. When he put in the terms of surrender the provision which permitted the officers to retain their sidearms and horses, and when, at Lee's suggestion, he permitted the soldiers to take their horses home to do the spring plowing—he did more in ten minutes to heal the wounds of the torn and bleed-country than all the parliaments of the world could have done by statute in a century. This victory of peace he followed up by preventing President Johnson and Secretary Stanton from arresting Lee and other confederate generals on the charge of treason.

Grant was playing billiards one night in the old Williard hotel in Washington. A man came in and told him that Lee and Longstreet and others were to be arrested and tried for treason. "I'll be blamed if they are!" he exclaimed, put on his slouch hat, and walked out in the darkness towards white house. It is known that he threatened to resign as the head of the army if the administration proceeded with its intention of violating the parole which he had given when he accepted the surrender. The influence of Grant was far greater than that of the administration, and there were no trials for treason.

Before the war Grant had taken little interest in politics. He had voted in the presidential election for Buchanan, and had favored Douglas in 1860. He was reckoned a democrat, and was a slave holder through his wife, who was given slaves by her father, Col. Dent. Though he possessed little or no knowledge of political affairs, a grateful people twice elected him president of the United States. In his last annual message to congress he reviewed his work, deplored his lack of political experience, and declared that in his administration the "failures have been errors of judgment, not of intent." To this history and the world will agree. During part of Grant's term in the white house he was surrounded by unworthy advisers, upon whom he leaned too heavily, but the country never lost faith in his honesty or in his ability. Four years after he retired from the presidency there was a mighty popular movement to give him a third term, which was defeated only by the tradition that Washington refused such an honor.

As a business man Grant was unsuccessful. He was not a prosperous farmer in Missouri in the days before the war, and his father and father-in-law regarded him as almost a failure in life. After he left the presidency he became involved in Wall street, and was wrecked by his partner Ward. Reduced to poverty, he was persuaded to write an account of some of his campaigns for publication in a magazine. The country received them so gladly that he decided to write his personal memoirs. The cancer that had attacked his throat was causing him the most excruciating suffering, but he stuck to his task long after he was forced to stop using his voice for dictation. He wrote his notes with a pencil, revising them painfully and with much care. The work was finished just before the end came.

His body rests in the magnificent tomb in New York that is today the mecca of thousands who go to pay their respects to the memory of this great American soldier and man. The history of great wars cannot be written without the story of the United States, and that story cannot be told without the name of Grant.

BOWSER PAINTS FENCE

Many Things Happen to Interfere With Plan to Beautify Home.

FINALLY GIVES UP THE JOB.

Old Fellow Blames His Wife For the Misfortunes That Befell Him on This Occasion and Acts Like One Whose Sufferings Are Many.

[Copyright, 1907, by G. D. Daniels.]

When breakfast was finished the other morning Mr. Bowser did not shove back and rush upstairs and grab his hat and overcoat and hurry off with the declaration that he was fifteen minutes late and that his was the worst run house in America, according to his usual programme. On the contrary, he dallied around until Mrs. Bowser's curiosity got the better of her, and she asked if he thought it was Sunday.

"I am not going to the office this morning," he replied. "In fact, I am going to take the day off. I want to give the front fence a coat of paint and brighten things up a bit."

"I know of a painter who will be glad to do the work and do it well and cheap," she said.

"So do I, but he won't get a chance to swindle me. I don't propose to have that fence painted with chalk and kerosene oil. I want the best material, and I want the exercise, and I shall do the painting with my own hands."

"DOES THIS HOUSE LOOK AS IF A WASHERWOMAN LIVED HERE?"

Started to Paint Fence.

When he had changed into an old suit he began to look around for brushes and paint. He found two or three brushes and two or three old cans, and after throwing out hints that Mrs. Bowser had thrown away $10 worth of material to spite him he started off and bought a new supply. It was 10 o'clock before he was ready for work, and he had only put on a brushful of paint when three men came along and halted, and one of them brusquely demanded if he was the kind of man to take bread out of other men's mouths. In other words, did he propose to paint his own fence while members of the Painters' union were walking about in a state of starvation? The way the question was put to Mr. Bowser nettled him, and he answered that he would paint his own fence if twenty members of the union dropped dead of starvation. Thereupon one of the men called him names, a second knocked his hat off, and a third kicked over his pail of paint, and all ran away.

"If you will let me get a regular painter I will pay for it out of my own pin money," said Mrs. Bowser as she came out of the house.

"Never on the face of this earth!" shouted Mr. Bowser as he jumped up and down. "I am not a man that can be bulldozed. After what's happened I'd paint this fence if the painters shot me for it."

Would Call Her When Wanted.

"But don't you see"—

"I see nothing. When I want you out here I'll call you. The fence is going to be painted, and I'm going to paint it."

Mrs. Bowser re-entered the house, and he mixed a new supply of paint. He had painted the gate when a woman came along looking at the numbers on the houses and halted to say:

"I don't see 81 along here. I was told that there was a woman there who went out washing."

"This is 81!" shouted Mr. Bowser as he pointed over his shoulder at his own house. "Does this house look as if a washerwoman lived here?"

"But I thought from the looks of you"—

"The looks of me! Can't a man put on an old suit of clothes and paint his own fence without being taken for some scrub? There you go—leaning right up against the fresh paint!"

"You are a—a bad man—a very bad man, and I'll never get all this paint off in the world, and"— And the woman fled up the street, and Mrs. Bowser came out of the house to say:

"Mr. Bowser, I wouldn't have had that happen for a hundred dollars. That's a lady that I met at the euchre club last week, and I was going to call on her tomorrow."

"But she took you for a washerwoman."

"That was simply a mistake."

"Then she ought to have kept off the fence. I've got to do all that work over again. Didn't I say that I would call you if I wanted you?"

The gate had been finished on the outside and Mr. Bowser was brushing at the inside when he heard a heavy tramping and a wheezing, and he looked out between the pickets just as a fat man came along and halted to lean up against a shade tree and inquire:

"Say, you, don't Dr. Gregg live on this block?"

"Never heard of him."

"He is a one eyed man."

"Never heard of him."

"He cures asthma."

"Never heard of him."

Looking For a Doctor.

"And I've had it for ten years and want to be cured. I was told that he lived along here somewheres."

"And I've told you about a hundred times that I never heard of him!" shouted Mr. Bowser.

"Sir, if you knew what the asthma was," persisted the man as he lurched forward and caught the gate—"if you had suffered for one night as I have suffered for a thousand—if"—

"You old rhinoceros, but I'll have your life if you don't get away!" was thundered in his ear. And the man with the asthma lifted his painted hands to heaven and wabbled his painted knees and staggered away. Mrs. Bowser had seen it all from the front window, and she came out and said:

"Mr. Bowser, that was one of the deacons of my church, and I shall never dare attend service there again. Please let me get a painter to finish the fence."

"Not on your life! This is my job. If a church deacon with the asthma doesn't know any better than to grab hold of a painted gate let him try to rub off what he gets. By the seven spotted bulls, but can't a man take a day off and paint his own fence without all this fuss? What in thunder do they come along here for?"

Mrs. Bowser retired in as good order as possible, and for the next half hour Mr. Bowser was permitted to work in peace. Then a big dog came bounding up the street in an exuberant way, stopping now and then to chase his tail in a circle in the joy of living. The painter painted on and dreamed of no tragedy. When the dog smelled fresh paint he investigated. He wanted to know, you know, and he found out. The smell reminded him of the embalmed beef of Spanish war days, and he turned his side to the fence and rubbed and rubbed and growled his pleasure. He did not see the fat, red faced and baldheaded man rise up on the other side. He did not see that fat and so forth man on the inside of the fence gather up a stone flower vase and poise it in the air. From a woman thirty feet away came a scream, but the vase descended, and the dog fled with howls of dismay.

"Sir, that is my dog!" exclaimed the woman as she drew nearer.

"Durn his hide, but I wish I had mashed him flat!" retorted Mr. Bowser.

"You are a cruel, bad man, sir. The dog was simply playing with your fence."

"And look at it! He has rubbed the paint off of three miles of pickets and left enough hair to stuff a mattress. A woman that will lug a thundering dog around the street must expect to have him mashed."

Threatened to Report Him.

"I will report you to the police, sir. You have been guilty of cruelty to animals."

"And I'll have your dog shot for a nuisance!"

The woman passed on, and Mrs. Bowser came out with face as white as snow and queried:

"Mr. Bowser, do you know who that woman is?"

"No. We didn't have anybody to introduce us. I'd like to talk to her husband for about two minutes."

"It's the wife of the minister of my church."

"Well, has a minister's wife a right to lug an old dog as big as a house around the street?"

"She will never call on me again. She'll tell all the ladies to keep away. I can never step foot in the church again. Oh, Mr. Bowser, why did you do it? Why won't you stop now before murder is done!"

She went away with tears in her eyes, and Mr. Bowser took a moment to think. Then he threw his brush into the street and the paint pot after it and entered the house. In ten minutes he had changed his clothes and was out on the steps. Mrs. Bowser caught him there and asked:

"Are you going to the office?"

In reply he bestowed upon her a long, lingering look of reproach, a look of martyrdom, a look of one who had suffered long and had reached the limit, and then passed down the steps and out of the gate and was lost to sight up the street. The paint pot had come into his happy life and turned it to gall. M. QUAD.

Then cunningly he swerves
And to the batsman speeds the ball,
Describing magic curves.

The batsman hits it in the air.
With joy the bleachers howl
Until the umpire—heartless cur—
Emits a cry of "Foul!"

Then every fan in white hot rage
Agrees it would be bliss
If round the umpire he could drape

FIKE.

The people of this vicinity say "more rain, more rest," for it has rained every day during the past week so that the people can scarcely get any work done at all.

Wm. H. Thomas was working a few days last week for Mr. J. A. Fike, of W. Va., helping to build a lime kiln.

Mr. Frank Bowser and son George purchased a horse one day last week for the sum of $100, and returned the horse a day or two later to the man they purchased of for the sum of $95. That is what I would call a good bargain.

Mrs. Louisa Fike and Polly Barnthouse were visiting Mr. A. F. Fike one day last week.

Wm. H. and W. L. Thomas and families were callers at Mr. Mathias Frazee's on Sunday last.

Our Sunday school at this place is progressing very nicely so far this season. Although the school is small we can do just as good work as if it were larger.

Mary Vansickle, daughter of Charles Vansickle, of Frazee Ridge, died May 5, 1907. The funeral was conducted by Elder Joseph Guthrie, in the Asher Glade church on May 6, and interment was made in the L. C. Fike cemetery.

Mesdames Emma J. and Bertha Thomas and the latter's daughter were visiting at Mr. James Frantz's one day last week.

A piece of road between Mr. Mathias Frazee's and Mr. Flane Turney's is almost impassible. The mud is axle deep and unless something is done soon no one can travel it at all and it is the main road of this section for doctor, store and mill.

Work in this section is plentiful as every farmer during this wet weather has more work than he can do, and hands cannot be secured at any price.

RYAN'S GLADE.

On account of wet weather the farmers of this section are still hard at work getting in their spring crops, but there is prospect of better weather at this writing.

Miss Grace Riley was visiting friends at Dodson Sunday last.

Messrs. Scott and Elmer Hardey were guests of Elisha Harvey's last Sunday.

We are glad to hear that Miss Annie Steyer, who has been on the sick list for some time, is improving.

Miss Scinda Harvey attended Sunday school at Stoyer last Sunday.

Mr. C. E. Martin and family have moved from Schell, and are now living on Mr. B. W. Harvey's farm at this place.

BLUE BELL.

ALTAMONT.

Owing to the late spring, cold weather and considerable rain, farmers are very much in the rear in this section in getting out their crops.

Mr. Walter Hirshman is sowing oats for Mr. H. A. Schmidt on the Schmidt & Gibson farm.

Mr. Abe Garrett and wife returned home last week from a pleasant visit at Tunnelton, W. Va.

Mrs. Mattie Carder and little nephew have been visiting relatives in Pennsylvania the past week.

Mr. Theo George and wife returned home Saturday after a week's visit at Accident.

Mr. H. A. Schmidt was at Oakland Saturday and stopped off at Mt. Lake Park to attend lodge of the Red Men of which he is a member.

Mr. Thos. Rhodes, of Swanton, signal foreman of interlocking, made this place and Mt. Lake Park a call on Sunday. Tom was riding his new iron horse.

Mr. Wm. Ditto, operator at Swanton, took in the play at Oakland Saturday night and stopped off here on Sunday. Scott had better keep an eye open.

Miss Bessie Beckman, who taught a very successful school here the past winter is attending Normal at Oakland at present.

It is not often that old Seldom Seen has an opportunity to attend Sunday chool but from a side view Sunday we think Altamont has a school worthy of notice with Mr. Hiram Tasker superintendent and Mrs. H. A. Schmidt assistant superintendent, with a good attendance Sunday afternoon.

Operator Fred Reis, of Deer Park, was visiting his mother-in-law, Mrs. Jane Wright, last week.

Miss Lela Friend, one of Deer Park's accomplished young ladies, is at present visiting Mrs. A. M. Jeffreys.

Mr. A. J. Rexrode, track foreman at Deer Park was in town Monday.

Mr. Richard Roy spent Sunday at Oakland, the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Fulmer.

We understand Mrs. Peter Lohr, who resides about one half mile from here, is very ill at this time.

Mr. John W. Comp, who has had charge of the pumping station at 36 w. s. for several years, has been transferred to a more lucrative position in the same department, now having charge of all water stations from Cumberland to Grafton.

Mr. J. A. Wright and wife are visiting friends at Terra Alta at this writing.

Sammy Friend of Swanton, was visiting his brother Barney here on Sunday.

Mr. James Cumming, of Barnum, W. Va., was visiting Mr. Jacob Hershberber. A few days ago Mr. Cummings was taken with a sharp pain in his eye causing the loss of sight. It is said the eye ball burst.

Mrs. Sadie Smith was at Oakland on business Monday of this week.

The track foreman and men here enjoyed a pleasant surprise when Foreman Smith was notified by his supervisor that they had all been awarded an increase in pay.

Mr. Spencer Hardesty passed through our town Sunday.

Aunt Biddy Carran who has been suffering with a severe cold for some time, we are glad to note, is much improved.

Mrs. Jno. Comp was at Oakland on business Monday.

Mrs. Malyssie Smith went to Keyser Tuesday to visit her sister, Mrs. Geo. Barker.

Hon. Fred George passed through our village Monday.

Considerable improvemenns are being made on Altamont Springs farm under the supervision of Manager Hugh Calderwood, who succeeded Mr. Chadderton, deceased.

| County Treasurer | 1,761 92 |
| Contingent Fund | 4,572 50 |
| Total | $76,031 76 |

To pay this amount it was ascertained that the taxable property as shown by the Assessment Books amounts to $8,175,485.00, which, at 93 cents on the $100 will make the above amount for County purposes—$76,031.76.

Deducting $635,419.00 for Corporations paying direct to the State Treasurer leaves the basis $7,540,039.00 at 16 cents on each $100, makes $12,064.06, and this added makes the taxes for State and County purposes $88,095.82.

A. G. ROSS, Clerk.

A Comparison.

"Some years ago, I used

Davis' 100 per cent Pure Paint

on my home, at the same time, several other houses near me were painted with other paints. There is a big contrast today between the appearance of my house and others." J. H. PRUITT, Chincoteague, Va.

If you compare adulterated paint with Davis 100 per cent Pure, you will readily know why my house painted with Davis looks well and wears well.

EV. LUTHERAN SYNOD.

Interesting Session—Next Meeting at Westernport.

The semi-annual meeting of the Allegany Conference of the Evangelical Lutheran church, Synod, Maryland, was held in St. John's Lutheran church, Davis, W. Va., Rev. R. B. McGiffin, pastor, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of last week. The conference sermon was delivered by Rev. W. H. Berry, of Terra Alta, W. Va., president of the Conference, The devotional exercises on Tuesday morning were in charge of Rev. A. G. Null, of Fairmont, W. Va., after which the annual business session was held and the officers for the coming year elected. At Tuesday afternoon's session, "The importance of organizing the Women's Home and Foreign Missionary Society" was discussed, following an address on the subject by Rev. Wm. C. Ney, of Elkins, W. Va. There are several of these missions and the reports were most favorable. At the evening session Rev. John S. Braren, pastor of the Bedford street Lutheran church, Cumberland, delivered a sermon on "The Augsburg Confession." Wednesday's devotional services were in charge of Rev. J. B. Shoup, of Bittinger, Md., and was followed by a business session. In the afternoon the "Lutheran vs. the Episcopal Form of Church Government," was the subject of an address and discussion led by Rev. H. C. Salem, of Friendsville, Md. The conference was brought to a close at night with discussion of young people's work. Rev. L. W. Sifford, of Clarksburg, W. Va., spoke on "Why and when should boys join the church." Rev. G. R. Wagoner, of Frostburg, delivered an address on "How may we best win and hold the young men." "What can young men and women do in the church?" "Different organization and their advantages" was discussed.

The conference, which started six years ago with six ministers, has grown wonderfully and now represents seventeen charges in Maryland and West Virginia. Its menbers are W. H. Berry, of Terra Alta, W. Va.; Wm. A. Wade, of Westernport, Md.; H. C. Salem, Accident, Md.; J. B. Shoup, Bittinger, Md.; . Ulrich, Brandonville; J. Wm. McCauley, Cumberland, St. Paul's; Jno. S. Braren, Cumberland, German; L. A. Mann, D. D., Cumbarland, St. John's; D. W. Sifferd, Clarksburg; Russell B. McCriffin, Davis; Jno. G. Koser, Eglon; W. C. Ney, Elkins; A.G. Null, Fairmont Fred. R. Wagner, Frostburg, Md.; A. F. Richardson, Grafton; C. P. Bastain, Keyser; Edmund Manges, Oakland, Md.; W. H. Berry, Terra Alta, W. A. Wade Westernport, Md. Rev. J. W. McCauley of Cumberland was elected president, and also Editor of the "Young Luthern" Rev. G. R. Wagner, of Frostburg, vice president, and Rev. W. A. Wade, of Westernport, secretary and treasurer. The fall meeting of the conference will be held at Westernport. The meeting was most enthusiatic. Pastors of other churches in Davis attended and showed a most friendly interest in work of the synod. All visitors were treated to a ride to the famous Blackwater Falls, and on Tuesday evening all were entertained at parsonage of St. John's Lutheran church by Pastor McGiffin.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Another cold snap, with frost and ice Tuesday morning.

The people are still coming and occupying cottages for the summer.

The Misses DeBerry are here putting their cottages in order for guests.

Mrs. W.W. Davis, who had been ill in Baltimore where she spent the winter, accompanied Dr. Davis to the Park Monday, where she will remain for the season. Miss Elenor Davis will remain in Baltimore until the close of the school she is attending.

Mr. J. L. Echard lost one of his span of match bay horses, it having died Saturday night. Mr. E. paid $400 for the pair.

We are promised the Chautauqua program by June 10, but do not expect to see it so soon.

Mr. Stephen Mattingly, of Piedmont, was in the Park Sunday.

The new postoffice building is rapidly approaching completion.

Mrs. Reed, who spent a few weeks at the Park, returned to her home in Fairmont, W.Va.

Miss Jennie Murphy has leased the Fallon cottage and has it in order for guests. Miss Murphy has had considerable experience and will no doubt please those who may be her guests.

Through the courtesy of the Mountain Lake Park Association the M. E. congregation are worshiping in the Hall of Philosophy until the completion of the repairs to their church building.

Mr. McQuay spent Sunday in the Park.

Dr. and Mrs. Selby and little daughter of Oakland, spent Sunday here at the home of Mrs. Selby's parents, Mr. and Mrs. McQuay.

The Park will be lighted by electricity Saturday night.

Preaching in the Hall of Philosophy Sunday morning at 11 o'clock by Rev. Lee, a returned missionary from India.

Prof. R. G. Richardson and family of Piedmont, W. Va., are with us again with a large stock of housefurnishings.

Judge Lynch, of Clarksburg, W. Va., was in the Park Wednesday looking at cottages with the purpose of purchasing.

We understand that Mr. Wm. Scott, a former Oaklander, will, with his family, occupy the Yoder cottage on I street during the season.

Superintendent Davis desires to meet all hotel and boarding house keepers and citizens of the Park generally at the Hall of Philosophy Monday evening next at 8 o'clock.

NAMES COL. GEORGE A. PEARRE FOR GOVERNOR

The Chairman of Garrett County Republican Committee Makes Strong Plea for a United Party.

Last Friday's Baltimore American contained a special telegram dated at Oakland with reference to political matters, in which Col. A. G. Sturgiss, chairman of the County Committee, gave his views and urged the necessity for all Repudlicans to unite in order to win in the State. The special was as follows:

Col. A. G. Sturgiss, chairman of the Republican State Central Committee for Garrett county, favors the renomination of President Roosevelt or the nomination of a candidate who will carry out his policies. He also launches a boom for Col. George A. Pearre for governor, and urges his nomination by the Republican State Convention. In speaking today of the sentiment of the Republicans in Garrett county with reference to the presidency and the governorship, he said:

"While the sentiment of Western Maryland is largely in favor of the renomination of President Roosevelt, or someone in perfect accord with his administrative policies, there is almost unanimous opinion in the western counties of Maryland that the question of the presidency, or the selection of delegates to a conventionsfor the nomination of same, should not at this time take precedence over the question of selecting suitable candidates for governor and other state officers, as well as a legislature which will be called upon to participate in the selection of two United States senators, and, more than probable, to guard against the enactment of a law similar to the Poe Disfranchisement Amendment, so well-known to all Maryland voters.

"More than a year must elapse before the delegates to the next Republican National Convention shall have been chosen, and yet there has been an effort made which seems to be deep-rooted in the political minds of a few who seem to have but one idea before them, and that is political patronage, to set sail for a preliminary presidential campaign. This was done in the face of muinicipal elections in this state, and the result was to aid in the defeat of deserving candidates.

"The Republican party is the party of good government, of clean and capable administration, and public interests demand its retention or ascendancy in power, and that may be accomplished only by the harmonious co-operation of all leaders, as well as the rank and file of the party, and it is for these reasons that the Republicans of Western Maryland believe the state campaign should be first considered.

"They believe that he should be a man whose public acts in the past show him competent, also that he should have the confidence of the people of the state, and that he be in full accord with the present administration of national affairs and in perfect harmony with all the policies of President Roosevelt. This man the Republican voters of Western Maryland believe to be the Hon. George A. Pearre, representing the Sixth congressional district. And notwithstanding that he has publicly announced his intentions adverse to the nomination, we believe that party, as well as public necessity, calls him to serve as the party candidate for governor this fall. Pearre's nomination would mean his election.

"Theodore Roosevelt, or someone of his closet advisors, should be the next Republican nominee for president of the United States. The people of Western Maryland believe in President Roosevelt because he proceeds on the principles of live and let live. He has adhered to wise commercial policies and sound principles of wisdom, and, by his acts, capital and labor are closer together today than ever before."

"What is the opinion of the Republicans of your section as to early or late primaries?" Colonel Sturgiss was asked.

"From what we read in the newspapers, it appears that the question is now creating quite a discussion between the Democrats of the state and the conservative and better element of that party, the latter favoring a late convention, while the professional officeseeker, as well as the ward heelers of the Democratic party, want an early convention.

"From a Republican standpoint, we of Western Maryland are ready at any time for a primary, but from past experience we find it to the best interest of the voter to have a late primary and convention. Baltimore city, as well as Allegany county, has a legalized primary election law governing their action and, to fully legalize the convention's action, it seems to us that a late convention is absolutely necessary. Collector Stone, the recognized leader of the party in Baltimore city, in an interview in your paper on the 18th instant, gave excellent reasons in support of late conventions."

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. MARY KLOTZ.

Mary, wife of Christian Klotz, a faithful member of the German Lutheran church at Accident, died Feb. 1, 1907, at the age of 59 years, 5 months, 4 days. The funeral services were conducted by Revs. J. G. Groenmiller, D. D., and H. C. Salem, Feb. 3. Mrs. Klotz was held in the highest esteem by all who knew her; was always loyal to her church. "The memory of the just is blessed."

MRS. LENA FOX.

Lena Fox was born May 22, 1824, died at the home of her son, F. G. Fox, in Friendsville, May 13, 1907, aged 72 years, 11 months and 21 days. The funeral services were held the following Wednesday afternoon and were conducted by Rev. H. C. Salem, her pastor, assisted by Rev. A. L. Donachy A brief service was held at the house, after which the service was continued in the Lutheran church at Accident. Interment took place in the German Lutheran cemetery. The services were largely attended. Thus died a woman of eminent piety who was faithful to her Savior to the end of life. She has gone to her reward.

How Visiting Helps the Pastor.

[The following was read in a public meeting of the Ministerial Association of Friendsville, May 7, 1907, and on motion of Professor Beahm publication in these columns was requested;—Editor.]

In the allotted time and length of this paper, we shall not be able to bring to this attentive and intelligent audience but little of what might be either said or written upon this subject. We would remind you, however, that the people do not receive all the good, or help, that is found in a visit from their pastor. There are times when the people are not prepared to receive a visit from their pastor or any one else, unless it be those who let the house and children keep themselves while they spend most of their time in running around gossiping with thhir neighbours, and while this class of folks stand in much need of the good from a visit by their pastor, he can seldom find them home unless it be at meal time, and not always then; of course at the dining hour is when it would be a good time for a hungry pastor to call, but it most frequently couses a feeling of embarassment to the house keepers. There are some who have regular hours to receive visitors, and a visit at any other time, even though it be from their pastor, would not be at all agreeable. The pastor, nevertheless, is expected to visit from house to house; no, not every honse, but only to the houses where one or more of his members live, and to such other families who are not members of any church at all, for none of us pastors have any regular right to visit members of other churches, unless we receive a special invitation to do so; to do otherwise, it appear to be to proselyte, about whom Jesus said: "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrits, for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he (or she) is made, ye make him (or her) twofold more the child of hell than yourselves."

We must not forget the fact as we go along, that there are times when the pastor must visit, or have a conscience that is not void of offence towards God or man. When we begin to have a guilty conscience because we have not done our duty in visiting, we have got to get out among our people or get out of harmony with our high calling, and the best remedy we have as yet discovered to prevent a chronic case of the "blues" or the wash-day, or house-cleaning troubles, is to go visiting, or spend a few hours ringing doorbells. Whether we find the people at home are not, we will find that sweet peace of mind and clearness of mental vision, and a "conscience void of offence towards God and man" has returned, and that the "blues" have gone. No, it matters not whether we find the people cleaning house, at the washtub, scrubbing the floors, or not at home, the pastor who has gone forth in the name of Jesus and the fear of God, can return to his study and sit down in peace and accomplish more in his books in one hour, than he could have done in several hours before his visits were made.

Another way a pastor can help add comfort to his own feelings and happiness to his own soul, is to know why some are not regular in their attendance to divine services and why some are, and there is no better way for him to receive this help than find it by visiting among his people. A short time ago we made a visit to a home and found that not a member of that family could be at the service that evening, where the rule is for four or five to be in almost every service held in their church. If we had not made that visit, we would have wondered why none of them were at the meeting, and, we might have some "vain imaginations" about it but by visiting them and knowing the reason for this absence, we were able to preach a better sermon and conducted a better altar service, than we could have done with doubts in our mind as to the reason for their absence; and, so it is, we never help others in our pastoral visits more than we help ourselves.

We have received much help in the making of a sermon by visiting our people. After we have seen them in their own homes, learn their bad as well as their good qualities, observe their weakness and their strength in the faith of the gospel of the Son of God, and charged our mind with all that has been said or done, and when we occupy our sacred throne in the presence of God and his people, facing these conditions so recently learned, if we are living close to God, if we are spending much time in secret prayer, and if we are filled with the power of the Holy Ghost, we will find that the soiled and faded manuscript the product of faithful prayers and hard study of the past, will be ignored, and that a fresh sermon from the homes of our people will take its place, given us by the Holy Spirit, which the inspiration of the hour will enable us to give unto our people, who have come to the house of worship, hungering and thirsting for the Bread and for the Water of eternal life.

A Year With No Summer.

During the extraordinary year 1816, according to best record, January and Febuary were warm and spring like. March was cold and stormy. Vegetation had gotton well on in April, when real winter set in. Sleet and snow fell on seventeen different days in May. In June there was frost or snow every night but three. The snow was five inches deep for several days in succession in the interior of New York, and from ten inches to three feet in Vermont and Maine. July was cold and frosty; ice formed as thick as window panes in every one of the New England States.

August was still worse; ice formed nearly an inch in thickness and killed nearly every green thing in the United States and in Europe. In the spring of 1817 corn which had been kept over from the crop of 1815 sold from $5 to $10 a bushel, the buyer purchase for seed. On May 10, 1885, snow fell to the depth of a foot in Jamestown, W. Va., and was piled up in huge drifts in most of the northern states.

MANY FALSE REPORTS

Are Current Regarding the Yough River Oil and Gas Company's Well.

Within the past few days reports concerning the Yough River Oil and Gas Company's well, located on the Harned farm near Oakland, have been circulated in all parts of the country to the effect that oil had been struck in paying quantities at the depth of fifteen hundred feet, whereas the facts are the well has been sunk to a depth of only one hundred and twenty feet, this level having been obtained more than two weeks ago when the cable parted and work was suspended until a new rope can be secured from the manufacturers in Philadelphia.

As stated in these columns last week the cable was shipped from Philadelphia on the 17th inst., via Pennsylvania railroad, instead of over the Baltimore and Ohio, since which time it has been lost track of by the railroad officials.

Mr. Galbreath, one of the contracting firm having the work of boring the well in hand, went to his home near Wheeling on last Friday night and before his return here he will endeaver to secure a cable from some dealer in oil well supplies at Wheeling, which he will use until the lost cable turns up at is destination. In the meanwhile work at the well is at a standstill.

Coal Company Chartered.

Articles of incorporation were filed in the Record Office at Baltimore by the George's Creek Cumberland Coal company, which is organized for the purpose of coal-mining. It has an authorized capital stock of $1000. The incorporators are messrs. Nichoals P. Bond, Edward Duffy, Ralph Robinson, Edward P. Hill and Albert B. W. Dew. At the same time papers were filed by the Star Trading company by the same incorporators. The company, which is orginized for the purpose of dealing in general merchandise, wholesale and retail, has an authorized capital stock of $5000.

Penn-Garrett Coal Company.

The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Penn-Garrett Coal Co., was held in Friendsville, Md., on Tuesday, May 21, 1907, and the following officers were elected: C. L. Pullen, of New York city, president; L. E. Friend, Friendsville, Md., vice president; Carlton M. Moody, of Philadelphia, Pa., treasurer; J. R. Tennant, Jersey City, N. J., secretary, J. N. Alsip, Friendsville, Md., assistant secretary and treasurer. The board of directors for ensuing year are C. L. Pullen, Nathan Haines, J. R. Tennant, Leslie E. Friend, Thos. H. Jones, C. M. Moody and J. N. Alsip. The company is in excellent shape and the coal now being mined is of a superior quality, and work will be crarried on in a vigorous manner.

THE NEW COURT AND THE OLD ONE

The Imposing Judicial System of the States.

The recent session of the United States District Court for Maryland, held in this city, was an event of considerable interest to the people of Western Maryland, it being the first court of the kind held here or anywhere else, except Baltimore city.

A comprehensive sketch or statement of the Federal, or U. S. Judicial system, might form interesting and useful reading matter for our people if given in a careful and correct form. This, I will endeavor to do. The constitution of the United States, given us in 1787, by our forefathers, divides our whole governmental, system called Articles. The Judiciary being Article 3.

The first section provides: "The judicial power of the United States be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain, and establish. The judges of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

Under this article all our vast national judicial system was established by Congressional enactments. The first of the kind was passed in 1789, at the very beginning of our national government, Many acts on the same line followed from time to time, such as circumstances and our rapid development called for. The whole judicial system or department was and is divided into three divisions: 1, the U. S. District Courts; 2, U. S. Circuit Courts, and lastly, the Supreme Court of the United States. The powers, duties and jurisdictions of all these courts are particularly defined by the Constitution and the laws creating them. The District Courts are the primary or lowest in the scale. Each state in the Union has at least one of these, and some of the larger states two or even more. Our good old State which is one of the original 13, forms one. Then follows the Circuit Courts, 9 in all. A Circuit Court is formed by a number of contiguous district courts with one of the judges of the Supreme Court as the chief with the district judge as associate. We belong to the fourth circuit, which is composed of Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina.

The Supreme Court is just what the name designates, the highsst law tribunal in this or any other country. Its present membership consists of nine judges with Melvin W. Fuller of Illinois as chief since 1888. The associates are are Harlan, Brewer, White, Peckham, McKenna, Holmes, Day and Moody. The living retired justices are Shiras and Brown. The first two chiefs were Jay and Elsworth, not much remembered.

John Marshall, the most distinguished of all, was appointed by President Jefferson in 1801, and served to his death in 1835, when he died at the age of 80 years. Then came Rodger B. Taney, of our own State. He served till his death in 1864, aged over 80 years. Then followed S. P. Chase, of Ohio. He served 9 years, to his death in 1873. He was snceeed by Morris Waite, of the same state, upon his death he was succeeded by the present acceptable chief in 1888. The ascent to this exalted office has three steps or flights, the District Court, Circuit Court and Supreme Court.

Our national court system is a vast and complicated one. It requires persons "learned in the law" to understand it, and some times when they misunderstand it. High courts themselves are frequently at variance on legal questions. The law is a science, but not with the certainty of mathematics. Besides the tribunals mentioned there are other courts authorized by acts of Congress; the most important of which is the court of claims created by the act of Gongress in 1855, consisting of five members. But this court is not strictly a legal tribunal. Its duties and authority lies in the adjustments of disputed claims against the United States and in this respect is more in the nature of a board than a court of law.

Much more could be produced on the wide subject of natioual jurisprudence and the many laws of Congress in reference thereto, but this would necessitate a lengthy paper, which might not be desirable by general readers. For that reason comprehension has been more in mind than expansion. The wishes and comforts of readers should not be overlooked in offering them reading matter.

This new Federal Court to be held in Cumberland, with its four terms a year, is not a separate or independent one, but in the nature of a branch of the district court for Maryland, to be presided over by Judge Morris, his clerk and marshall for Cumberland. Juries will be summoned to be taken, as is supposed from the three upper counties of the State. This new tribunal will be a great accommodation to the people of Western Maryland in both civil and criminal business. It will practically be a home court; and is in line with the policy of the government to make justice and other needs of the people as convenient and ready to them as possible. This could be shown by many references to the past, especially in mail matter.

The new building for the post-office and court house is a very desirable one. Cost $150,000.

Much credit is due the energetic and able men who brought about this needful work: Hon. W. M. McKaig, Hon. Geo. A. Pearre and U. S. Senator G. L. Wellington. Their services will not be forgotton.

Not many cases from our region have gone to the Federal Courts. Several insurance cases against non-resident companies are recalled. Also one ejectment case against parties of what is now Garrett county by a man of Somerset county, Pa. The case was instituted in the U. S. Circuit Court at Baltimore, and from there carried up to the Supreme Court, and here decided finally in 1840. It was a case with incest for its foundation in the most hideous form—a man knowingly marrying his own daughter with four or five children as results. This case is to be found in 14 Peters Report, Brewer vs. Blocher, Attys, for plaintiff B. S. Pigman and Wm. Price and T. J. McKaig for defendents, the rightful winners.

WASHINGTON CHAT.

Breezy, Newsy Notes From the Nations Capital.

It is certain that the entire country will be astounded to learn that there is more than a grain of truth in the assertion made by the Episcopal Ministers of Washington that Sunday is less observed in the Nation's Capital than in any other city of the East. Investigation of conditions shows the startling fact that too much attention is given by a great number of Washingtonains to golf, riding and driving, dinner parties and reception and as a result, the attendance at the church has fallen off perceptibly, contributions are less, communicants are fewer and there is a woeful lack of general interest in church matters.

A mass of figuers have been compiled by the clergy, figures which when boiled down show the condition in the Episcopal churches of Washington now and those of a year ago. In other denominations it is said that the ratio is the same. In 1906 there were ninty-six clergymen, as against 100 the year before; 904 persons were confirmed in 1906 as against 1,098 in 1905 and the total offering in the churches for the past year were but $304,000, whereas the year before the sum contributed was $316,000.

It is asserted by the ministers that Sunday, throughout a large part of the Washington, is neither a day of rest nor of religious observance. Government officials are constantly engaged in unnecessary Sunday labor; building contractors uninterruptedly fulfill their contracts and storekeepers without let or hindrance, open their stores.

Simultaneously while these are toiling at business tasks, others by thousands are toiling for pleasure. Dinner parties and receptions are being more and more given on Sunday. Golf is claiming an ever-increasing number of votaries, while Sunday riding and driving is many times greater than on weekdays. Even the morning hours of Sunday, heretofore sacred to divine service, are now devoted, in certain quarters, to breakfasts at which as many as 200 or 300 have sat down. Theatres are generously patronized and all sorts of amusement are in full swing. Whether the city officials or the Representatives in Congress who have the city of Washington under their supervision, are to blame for some of the existing conditions is not stated, but now the clergy have so loudly protested it is likely that a part of the evils will be routed out.

Hundreds of thousands of Civil War veterans who have filed applications for pensions under the new service pension law, will be disappointed in the long delay that must necessarily result in their cases receiving attention, due to the rush of work in the government Pension Bureau. The law was enacted at the last session of Congress and is now less than ninety days old, yet the applications for pensions under it already exceeded by nearly 100,000, total estimated beneficiaries. The rush of applications has swept the force of the Pension Office off its feet and the applications are coming in at the rate of 5,000 a day with no signs of a let-up. So far 325,000 have been received and the clerks have barely had time to file them without attempting to pass on their respective merits. The clerical force is being pushed to the limit and several new bureaus have been established.

When the demand for a pension from every soldier who served ninety days in the Union Army became so insistent that Congress could no longer ignore it, a request was made of the Commissioner of Pensions for an estimate as to the probable cost of such a law. The Commissioner put his experts at work, and after studying the pension rolls informed Congress that provision for 234,006 beneficiaries would be ample and that he figured the yearly cost as $15,000,000. Evidently the Commissioner was mistaken in his calculations, for figuring on the basis of the 325,000 claims already, the total yearly disbursement out of the Treasury will be more than $25,000,000.

The Pension Office officials have not had time to examine many claims, so it is impossible to state at this period what proportion will be allowed, but there is serious doubt whether the appropriation made for the service law will be sufficient and the chances are that it will be exhausted before all the claimants have received their lawful allowances.

The house and Senate of the United States eyidently believe in the saying that "cleanliness is next to godliness," judging from the fact that during each month of the last session the legislators and their henchmen used on an average of 34,000 towels—32,315 hand towels ane 1,617 bath towels. The towels, some hundred thousand in number, are the property of the Government but the washing of them is done by private contractors and it is at this time of the year that bids are requested for the doing of the work. The Chief Clerks of the House and Senate have the matter in charge and on the 29th of May the bids will be opened with much ceremony and pomp. Last year the price for washing was paid at the rate of 30 cents per hundred but this year the bidders have formed sort of a merger and it will cost Uncle Sam more money than usually does to dry the hands of his lawmakers. The bills for washing towels for the months of the last session amounted to $600 and as the next session is a six-month term, even more money will be spent for clean towels. According to the number of towels used yearly, it is easily seen that both the House and Senate are far up in the scale of righteousness.

INQUIRY INTO BASIN OF POTOMAC RIVER.

Principal Features Embraced in an Interesting Publication.

Hardly river basin in the country is more important from the point of view of utilization of water resources than the Potomac. The water power developed in this area drives the wheels of many mills, and the waters of the streams are used in the processes of diverse industries. The beauty of the streams and the supply of fish have made a large portion of the basin a recreation ground for thousands of people, while the Potomac itself furnishes drinking water for the national capital.

In order to obtain definite information as to the character of the water supply an extensive investigation was undertaken jointly by the Geological Survey, the Bureau of Forestry and the Bureau of Fisheries. The result of the work is a report just published by the Geological Suvey as Water Supply and Irrigation Paper No. 192, copies of which may be obtained upon application to the director, United States Geological Survey, Washington, D. C.

The scope of the paper is best shown by enumerating the principal features of the investigation, which are as follows: (1) A study of the geograpic history of the basin (2) the determination of the amount of water flowing in the principal streams, a compilation of data relating to the quantity of water and a study of the rainfall; (3) a complete reconnaissance of the dainage area with respect to sources of pollutlon, a study of the prevalence of typhoid fever in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and an investigation of the quality of the surface water as shown by field assays and sanitary and mineral analyses of water taken at many points; (4) a study by the Bureau of Forestry of the effect of soils and forest cover on the turbidity of the water and in flow of the streams and the preparation of a map showing the forest condition (5) a study by the Bureau of Fisheries of the effects of industrial wastes on fishes.

Many citizens of the Potomac Basin have shown a lively interest in this report, and have given valuable aid to the authors of the paper, Messrs. Horatio N. Parker, Bailey Willis and R. H. Bolster, of the Geological Survey: W. W. Ashe, of the Bureau of Forestry, and M. C. Marsh, of the Bureau of Fisheries.

Winston's Work

By HONORE WILLSIE.

Copyright, 1907, by M. M. Cunningham.

The sun was just rising behind the bluffs when Darrel strolled out on to the veranda of the bungalow. On the east shore the Mississippi was still dark and gray with night shadows, but toward the dim line of Minnesota the water was liquid crimson.

Darrel, a fine, strong figure in his bathing trunks, shivered as he paused to look at the familiar beauty of the great river. Then he took a breath that swelled his deep chest and plunged with great bounds down the bluff side to the river far beneath. When he returned, red and dripping, Jim, his darky factotum, was setting the breakfast table on the veranda, and in a short time Darrel was drinking his coffee and looking out at the tender spring green of the midstream islands.

It was for over a year now that he had piqued the curiosity of the "natives" by living alone on the bluff side. Two isolated facts, however, known to the gossips, accounted for all his eccentricities. Darrel was a writer and a New Yorker. They called him surly. They could not know that he was merely readjusting his lifelong theory of married happiness. They could not know that he was merely fighting to recover his old time buoyancy that had left him that spring morning when Elizabeth had told him that she was going to devote her life not to him, but to her "art."

Darrel sighed, then rose abruptly.

"Jim," he said, "Mr. Winston may come today, so you had better watch the bend sharply about noon."

"Yessah."

"And you may as well fix up the guest room this morning."

Jim looked around at the simple furnishings of the porch and living room critically. Jim had served Darrel's father and had privileges.

"Am Mr. Winston very particular, sah?"

Darrel smiled. "I don't know, Jim. The publishers are sending him out to get illustrations for my book. This will have to do." And he swung down the bluff side to the little pier where was tied a string of canoes and skiffs. He jumped into a canoe and was off down the river, with beautiful long strokes of the paddle that told of many hours spent on the water. In fact, it was from the hours spent on this river that Darrel's book had grown. He had written it in a fervor of enthusiasm over the wonders of the Mississippi, and the publishers had received it joyfully. Darrel had found a new field.

SHE SAT IN SILENCE FOR A MOMENT.

The noon train drew slowly up to the station platform, and Darrel turned away in disappointment. But one passenger alighted, and that was a woman. He glanced back once more to make sure that he was not mistaken. Then he halted. There was something very familiar about the slender, well dressed figure standing hesitatingly at the far end of the platform. Suddenly the girl moved toward him.

"Oh, Horace!" she cried.

"Yes, Elizabeth," he replied quietly as if they had not parted over a year ago.

"Well, aren't you glad to see me?" brightly. "And what are you going to do with me?"

"I don't know," said Darrel to both questions. "What brought you here, Elizabeth?"

The girl looked into his face, with her candid blue eyes full of wonder.

"Why, Horace, didn't they send you word that I was coming?"

"'They?' Who are 'they?'" Darrel's fingers were trembling a little.

"Mr. Tompkins, your publisher."

Darrel sat down heavily on a truck, then arose. "They wrote me that they were going to send Winston. You—you know my old prejudice, Elizabeth."

Elizabeth's beautiful mouth twitched, and her eyes twinkled. "You have always said that a woman could do only 'pretty' work; that she could put no strength into her sketches. Come, Horace; you are not very hospitable, are you?"

Darrel was himself again instantly. "You see, I could have put up Winston, but I am going to take you to Mrs. Brady, who will be glad to have a 'paying guest.'"

That afternoon Elizabeth sat in the canoe facing Darrel. In her lap was a sketch book. Darrel had said nothing more concerning feminine artistic ability. He was struggling with the old disappointment and with the old love that, as if the intervening years had been for nothing, had returned with redoubled force at the sight of Elizabeth's beauty. She was so dainty, so merry, so winsome, that Darrel had never been able to consider her for her art seriously. She was a thing to be adored and protected and slaved for. The toil of a profession was ridiculous considered with Elizabeth.

She sat looking at him in an inscrutable sort of way. "You must take me to the places you want sketched first, Horace, so that I won't get confused by seeing too much else."

They paddled slowly up to the foot of Gray Eagle. Darrel held the canoe against the current and looked up at the magnificent bluff side, whose great face was deep and cool with pines. The Mississippi bluffs were new to Elizabeth. She sat in silence for a moment, looking at the grandeur of river and shore. Then she began to sketch rapidly. All the brilliant spring afternoon they paddled about in silence for the most part. Elizabeth slipped her sketches as rapidly as they were finished into her portfolio, and Darrel did not ask to see them. He was grateful to Elizabeth that she did not rhapsodize over the scenery. Words were inadequate and idle here.

At last the girl, with a tired little sigh, slipped the last sketch into her portfolio. "Now, if you will come back to supper with me we will talk them over," she said.

They sat on Mrs. Brady's porch just before sunset, and Elizabeth laid one of her sketches in Darrel's hands. He gave a little start of surprise. How had she done it? The Mississippi, calm, swift and deep, in all its potency of motion; then for miles bluff after bluff, pushing into water, stern, forbidding, yet lovely; the tenderness of the blue sky, the softness of ragged clouds, the—

"Elizabeth," said Darrel, and his voice trembled a little, "I did not know that you could do this. This is better than Winston's best work."

Elizabeth looked anxiously into his face. "Do you think that?" she said.

Darrel again studied the sketch. "It is wonderful," he said. "You have told more in these few strong brush strokes than I have in my whole book. Elizabeth," wistfully, "how could you understand so well?"

Elizabeth clasped her hands softly in her lap. "Oh, but you see I've read the book and reread it, so I was prepared to see all that you did. The book was as—as fine and strong as you are, Horace."

The man rose and walked back and forth. "Elizabeth, can you ever forgive me for being such a fool as to belittle your work? Why, do you know, I admire Winston's work so much that I was in the seventh heaven when I found that I could get him to do my illustrating, and your work is far and away better than his." He turned toward the girl abruptly. "Elizabeth, why did you come?"

"Because"—the girl looked up at him bravely—"I wanted to see you again, and"— She paused.

"And?" suggested Darrel.

"And when you asked for Winston I was glad to come. I always sign my work Winston. It is my middle name, you know."

Darrel drew her close to him. "But your 'art?'" he questioned.

"I—I wanted to see if a woman could," she whispered.

"And a woman always shall," he said. "'Winston' shall illustrate all my books."

A Sailor Made Suit.

On the summer day that Captain Collins embarked with his ten-year-old son for a lake trip on a lumber vessel the weather was hot and sultry. The captain had more important matters than his son's wardrobe on his mind, and young Peter, with the shortsightedness of excited youth, left home without his jacket.

For two days the wind blew softly from the south. On the third day it switched suddenly to the north, bringing with it a cutting arctic coldness.

Mrs. Collins, fingering the forgotten jacket, had visions of her thinly clad son turned blue with cold or perhaps already stricken with pneumonia.

Two weeks later the travelers returned, the father beaming, the boy even more radiant in a bulging flannel garment of curious but ample cut.

"You see," explained Captain Collins, "Peter didn't have clothes enough, so we put in at the nearest port to buy him a coat. But there was only one store and not a ready made garment in the place, so I bought three yards of red flannel and made him a suit."

"Where," asked Mrs. Collins, trying not to laugh, "did you get the pattern?"

"Used the boy," said the captain proudly. "Laid the flannel on the deck, spread the boy on his back on top and cut all round him with my jackknife. Then I laid him on his stomach and cut out the front. How else could you make a pattern?"—Youth's Companion.

Aboriginal "Capias."

In the "History of the Town of Middleboro," Mass., there is a footnote quoted from the "New England Memorial," which gives a curious example of Indian courts and the ules of practice in them.

An Indian court in Barnstable county, presided over by an Indian magistrate, issued the following warrant to an Indian constable:

"I Hihoudi,
You Peter Waterman,
Jeremy Wicket:
Quick you take him,
Fast you hold him,
Straight you bring him
Before me,
"Hihoudi."

BAD FOR THE WAGE EARNERS.

Judge Grosscup Says Municipal Ownership Would Lower Wages.

Government control and operation would also be found, I think, to have a disadvantageous effect upon the special interest of the laboring man. Labor sometimes gets less than the enterprise employing can afford to pay, but labor never gets more, at least for any length of time, than the enterprise can afford to pay. Lowered efficiency therefore means lowered wages. And public ownership always has been and always will be on this account attended by lower wages. The men who are motormen on the municipal street railways of Glasgow, for instance, get a little less than 13 cents an hour; the motormen of Chicago get from 21 to 24 cents an hour. The locomotive engineer of a German government railroad gets $50 per month; the American locomotive engineer makes easily three times that much. And through the whole schedule of wages paid by public and by private enterprises the same difference runs.

But there is still another side to this objection, what may be called its personal side, the effect of public ownership on organized labor. Much as labor organizations have been abused here and there by opposing interests and much as here and there labor organizations have abused their privileges, it is in labor organizations that the laboring man finds and will continue to find the source of bettered conditions.

Asking for higher wages the one man is unheard. But the many speaking as one make themselves heard. So that the labor organization is the laborers' industrial protector.

But the many speaking as one must have some one to whom to speak, some concrete party with whom to deal. Under government ownership that party would be the whole public. Let not the ready sympathy of the people for alleviative measures such as factory legislation and the like be given too wide a significance, for even there the task was long and hard, nor the readiness of the public to side in at times of labor strikes with the employees. In those situations the public is an outside party, not the other party. Until in some public controlled enterprise there is a demand by the employee for higher wages or changed conditions, some demand that will directly cost the public something in dollars and cents, the laboring man is without proof that the public can be more easily reached than private enterprise.

Something in this line, however, we already know. Government servants, from the highest to the lowest, are the poorest paid people in America. Put man for man, against corresponding grades in private enterprise, the president of the United States against the presidents of the great corporations, cabinet officers against the managers of corporation departments, postal clerks on the railways against express clerks, laborers against laborers, the advantage in every case is with the employee of the private enterprise. And this we know, too—that, though the matter has often been urged, the people at large will not listen to any proposition for increase of pay in the government service. Given then a private employer or the public as employer with whom to deal, the one a thousand times more accessible and infinitely prompter to reach results than the other, to my mind nothing is clearer than that employment by the public would be followed by a severe impairment of the influence and efficiency of the labor organization and of the good it has done for its membership.—Hon. Peter S. Grosscup in American Magazine.

Electric Lighting Plants Short Lived.

During the past year the technical press has recorded the breaking down of a large number of municipal electric light plants because the equipment was worn out. It is interesting to note that in a large majority of cases the necessity for plant replacement came at a period of from ten to fifteen years after it had been installed, showing that the deterioration by wear alone amounted to from 7 to 10 per cent a year.

According to the municipal ownership advocates who claim that an allowance of 3 per cent for depreciation is adequate, these plants should all have lived for thirty years, yet wearing out is only one of the forms of depreciation, and most of these plants had been hopelessly out of date before their breakdown occurred.

Other cities may well take warning from the experience of these and make an allowance for maintenance and depreciation far in excess of the estimates of interested parties if they would avoid the thankless task of paying for broken down plants out of the tax levy.

Council Bluffs Rejects M. O.

The city council has turned down the municipal ownership proposition in connection with the city waterworks plant and voted to grant a new franchise to the water company, whose franchise expired some months ago. The action was taken after a monster petition, signed by almost every business man in the city, had been presented to the council asking that the municipal proposition be killed.—Municipal Journal and Engineer.

What Socialism Would Do.

The substitution of socialism, either absolutely or in a modified form, would be to strike down the best political system which has been thus far devised by the genius or wit of man, and it would undermine the last hope of the lovers of republican government in this world.—Vice President Fairbanks.

A SWEET LIFE CLOSED.

Shortly after noon Sunday the spirit of Mrs. Ida McKinley was called to the God who gave it. The entire nation learned to love Mrs. McKinley because of her worth as a woman and on account of the devotion of her great husband whom the nation so cherished. It seemed peculiarly sad that constant illness should keep Mrs. McKinley from sharing in a larger and more conspicuous manner the high honors bestowed upon him. During her husband's administration as governor of Ohio Mrs. McKinley was debarred by illness from appearing in public. When he entered congress she accompaided him to Washington. During her long illness her husband was most devoted to her and always planned for her pleasure and comfort. While a member of Congress Governor of Ohio and President of the United States he wrote the majority of his speeches and did his work as much as possible at a desk in her room in order that he might be near her. When the trip to the Pacific coast was planned she was advised to remain in Washington, but she did not wish to be separated from her husband for such a long period, and she was allowed to be one of the party. The excitement of the journey caused her to become ill, and she had been more or less ill since the assassination of her distinguished husband, until death claimed her as its own and took the spirit from her frail body on Monday afternoon. The death of Mrs. McKinley renews the precious memories of her beloved and devoted husband and causes a notion to weep afresh over his unnatural and untimely death.

IT is an ill wind that blows no good. This quality of spring weather is great for the life, liberty and pursuit of happiness to which fish are theoretically entitled.

THAT convention of doctors, preachers and undertakers at Indianapolis ought to be able to settle the proper disposition of mankind from start to finish.

THE tramps' convention at Chippewa Falls has indorsed both Roosevelt and Foraker. The hobos apparently want their bread buttered on both sides.

IT will soon be up to the summer girl to decide whether she will go to the seashore and wear a bathing suit that is the soul of wit, or to the mountains and wear a peek-a-boo shirt waist that is the spice of life.

POST OFFICES PROSPER.

There was a record broken in the postoffice department last week. The postmaster general turned into the treasury $22,359,120, the largest amount for one quarter in the history of the office. This was not so remarkable for the department is growing all the time and the receipts naturally increase. But the amount exceeded the expenditures by $1,800,815. This is a record sure enough. It indicates a good business administration and as a financial index to the prosperity of the country it is decidedly encouraging. Now that the postoffice is making an effort to get on even better business footing are carefully weighing the mails and adjusting railway payments to correspond, there seems a prospect of its becoming actually a self supporting department. This will be cheerful enough news to the general public, but it has a rathe ominous ring for the express companies, telegraph and telephone companies and others of great public utilities now run at immense profit by private corporations and whose constant claim has been in the past that the government could never do such work as they are doing cheaply and at a profit. Postal service is about the cheapest great service the public enjoys, and no one can say that it is not about the best also. It is nevertheless inferior to the postal services of England, Germany and France, for it permits a lot of capacious express companies to skim the cream of the service and skin the people of the United States.

Why a Backbone Beats a Wishbone.

"Trouble with most fellers," says Uncle Si Simlins, "is that their backbone is mostly all wishbone."

Uncle Si's sage sarcasm applies to people in every town. Some of us in this town might study it with profit.

You wish you could succeed in business. You wish you could do as well as your neighbor who does succeed. You are overworking your wishbone. Give your wishbone a rest. It's tired.

YOUR BACKBONE NEEDS EXERCISE. IT'S BACKBONE THAT DOES THINGS—NOT WISHBONE. STRENGTHEN YOUR BACKBONE AND GO UP AGAINST COMPETITION.

Marshall Field had competition, but his backbone gave him the nerve to advertise big in newspapers when advertising was not known to be such a Necessity of Business Life as it is now universally recognized. John Wanamaker had the same sort of backbone.

Their backbone backed up their wishbone.

Backbone builds business by beoming business.

Business is boosted by backbone.

And the backbone of business is newspaper advertising.

No, it is not always May—and that is something for which we should be duly thankful.

"HAVE you ever noticed how the word "thousand" is misspelled on the new $1,000 certificates?" asks the Minneapolis Journal. Oh, yes, frequently; but we didn't care to mention it.

"THERE is more real intoxication in some books than in a bottle of wine," says an essayist. That may be, for books are like wine, in that you never can tell from the label what is on the inside.

A professor of the University of Chicago has come to the front with a disavowal of the belief in the Bible record of Methuselah's age. We do not know which is more deserving of sympathy—Methuselah or the University of Chicago.

"HOKE Smith as a candidate for President would raise about as much enthusiasiasm as a presiding elder at a poker party when he was not expected," says the Nashville American. Still, if Hoke created that much consternation in the ranks of the enemy, he would be a first-rate man to nominate wouldn't he?

A COMMISSION TO REVISE TAX LAWS.

It is perfectly apparent from the public discussions that have been in progress from time to time that the tax laws of Maryland should be subjected to a searching inquiry by competent persons, with a view to determine whether a general revision is or is not necessary. It is eight months before the General Assembly meets, and something should be done during those months. Persons who have any acduaintance with the conditions which surround the Legislature while it is in session can readily understand that if any inquiry into the tax laws is to be made, the work must be done and the bill, if any, to be passed should be prepared in advance. In 1886, when there was a general clamor throughout the State for a new assessment of property, the Legislature authorized, by Chapter 488 of the acts of that, the appointment by the Governor of a commission of four persons to prepare a report on the subject of taxation and to serve without pay. The commission was composed of Hon. John Prentiss Poe, Hon. James Alfred Pearce and Prof. Ely, of the Hopkins. Judge McSherry was also appointed a member but he did not act. The bill reported by the Tax Commission was modified and introduced into the Senate by Senator Thomas G. Hayes and became the celebrated "Hayes Assessment bill," which was enacted by the Legislature and vetoed by the Governor. At the session of 1896 it was again introduced by Mr. Bankard, of the House of Delegates, and, after radical changes had been made, it was enacted, approved by Gov. Lowndes, and is on the statute books of the State to dav.

After the Bankard bill had been passed by the Governor the late B. F. Newcomer suggested certain supplementary acts regulating the assessment and taxation of securities. One of these acts has been under discussion for some time, and there is a demand in some quarters for its modification. At the banquet of the Credit Men's Association in Baltimore recently one of the speakers declared that "it has been a great drawback to Baltimore in getting corporations to come here, as the present mode of taxation almost makes it prohibitive for them to locate here." Under the existing law of Maryland stocks of foreign corporations owned by a citizen of this State "are assessed and valued at their actual value in the market, and those upon which no dividend shall be actually paid shall not be valued at all, and upon the valuation so made the regular rate of taxation for State purposes shall be paid, and there shall also be paid upon such valuation 30 cents, and no more, on each $100 for county, city and mininipal taxation." Under this law the stock of a company incorporated in Delaware, New Jersey or any State other than Maryland is taxed now at 46 cents on the $100, while the stock of a company chartered under the laws of Maryland, if held in Baltimore, is taxed at more than four times as great a rate. The reason that caused Mr. Newcomer to recommend this discrimination was the fact that in many States where the home office of a company is located the whole capital stock is taxed, and if such a is held in Maryland was to be taxed at the full rate here nothing would be left for the owner. But a result followed the enactment of the law which had not been anticipated. In order to get the benefit of the lower tax rate on their stock it has become a common practice for Marylanders to go to another State for their charters, even when the entire business of the company is to be transacted in this State.

This is one feature of the tax laws that is thought to need consideration. There has also been much recent discussion of the methods of valuation by the State Tax Commissioner and the right of appeal from his decisions, about the method of taxing franchises and other matters which are coming up from time to time, some of which are now in the courts of Montgomery county.

It might be well, in view of all these considerations, for the Governor to consider whether he should not take the initiative and select several competent lawyers and business men and request them to study the subject and make a report to the Legislature through him next winter. There may be no authority of law to pay such a commission. But if good service is done to the State the Legislature would doubtless be willing to pay for it.

It is true that the subject is partially covered in a bill prepared by the Corporation Commission appointed by Governor Smith and which was introduced in the Legislature at the last session, but which failed of passage. The enactment of that voluminous and in many respects most excellent measure seems so uncertain that it might be best to deal with the subject of taxation in a seperate and shorter bill incorporated nto the Code as part of Article 81, under the title "Revenue and Taxes."

BLOOMING ROSE.

We are having rain and cold weather.

The people of Blooming Rose and vicinity are not all done planting corn yet owing to wet weather.

Our county road from C. W. Friend's to S. I. Bowling's is almost impassable in places, our worthy supervisor, Mr. Bowling, not having enough money to reach the upper end of his appointment. Our citizens and taxpayers pray the County Commissioners to make special levy on this part of the road so we can get over it to Blooming Rose church without danger to our lives and teams. And please remember it.

Society folks are looking forward with much interest to the approaching marriage of Miss Edna Grace Hook to Mr. Roy M. Jones on Sunday evening, June the second, at 8 o'clock, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Ezra B. Hook near Blooming Rose church. Mr. Jones is a nephew of S. A. Kendall, of the Kendall Lumber Co., and is now in their employ at Kendall. An enjoyable time is expected among the many friends that are invited.

Milton Fike wears a a broad smile—a girl

Hauling lumber, crossties and props is the order of the day.

Our hustling merchant, C. W. Friend, is doing a lively business at his new store and is paying the highest market price for wool, props, butter, eggs, &c., and sells goods the cheapest. Give him a call and be convinced.

A. M. Chisholm has sold his farm to M.C. Sisler and bought the John Thomas farm near Markleysburg. Sorry to loose such a good neighbor as Roy.

Our genial friend J. S. Meyers is at home again, and says he expects to offer himself to the people in Garrett county for sheriff this term. Jake is a good fellow deserves the honor this time As he always give way to his competitors with the assurance of help in the future.

D. H. Friend has changed his course from New York to a more easterly direction.

B. F. Friend and Jas. Frazee have gone into the lumber business. We wish the boys success.

Mr. Taylor Friend, our ex-commissioner, is elated over his new daughter-in-law, and says he expects to work the road soon.

Ellis Friend says the spindle of his buggy will get a rest for good after the Fourth.

Mrs. S. E. Shirer returned home last Friday night from a visit to relatives at Grafton and Clarksburg, W. Va. While in Grafton she attended the Commencement of the Grafton High School, when her daughter, Miss Sue, graduated.

Mr. William R. Savage, of Monessen, Pa., was in Oakland on business yesterday, when he made this office a visit. Mr. Savage is for the present a visitor to his old home at Deer Park, being accompanied by his wife.

A Schell correspondent to the Keyser Echo says: Miss Emma Roderick decided this morning that the best thing out was aching teeth, so in company with her sister. Mrs. Lucas, she went to Blaine today, where she will give Dr. Stotler an opportunity to fill his mouth by emptying hers.

Our friend Henry Fresh, who for the past year or more resided in Lancaster, Pa., has again moved back to Cumberland, Md. He will be remembered by the many patrons of the Elk Lick Supply Company, he having been the chief clerk of that establishment, a few years ago.—Elk Lick Star.

Mr. W. A. Sturgiss, who was the guest of relativers in Meyersdale, Pa., for a week, returned to Oakland Saturday afternoon, being accompaid home by Mrs. Sturgiss, who had been the guest of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. George T. Hocking at Meyersdale for a few weeks.

Mr. Harry J. Frear left Oakland on Saturday for Factoryville, Pa., where he will remain a week or two with relatives and then go to Roseburg, Oregon, his future home. He will be accompanied west by Mrs. Frear, who went to Factoryville two or three weeks ago.

Messrs. John Reynolds, James B. Frantz, Ira Beckwith and William Whorton went to Peidmont Monday afternoon where they were initiated into Piedmont Aerie No. 707, Fraternal Order of Eagles that night. It is said that "Dugan" did the high stunts for the edification of the newly made members.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry C. Sincell returned from Baltimore on last Friday night. The latter underwent two serious surgical operations in the Maryland University Hospital in Baltimore, is very much improved and well on the road to recovery. They were accompanied to Oakland by Miss Trenholm, a graduate nurse, who will remain here a week or two.

Labor is one of the supreme laws of life. Toil is honorable. The progress which the world has made is a glorious testimonial to human handiwork. Those who work know more of genuine happiness than those whose lives seem dedicated to idleness.

We have no prejudice against the neatly dressed, nice appearing boy, while we do detest the fellow who goes around looking like a bunch of hard luck, but a girl looking for a model husband should be careful. If you don't know one when you see him, ask mother—she will reconize him at sight.

Mr. J. M. Savage, of Pinehurst, N. C., where he has resided a number of years, was in Oakland yesterday, when he made this office a brief business visit. On June 20th he will leave for Charlevoix, Mich., where he will engage in business for the summer, returning to Pinehurst this fall.

Mr. E. M. Mickey, formerly agent for the West Virginia Central Railroad at Gormania, but for a year or more occupying various positions along the line of that railway, was in Oakland yesterday looking for a location for a nickeldeon theatre, which he expects to have in operation here as soon as the equipment arrives.

In order that the employes of THE REPUBLICAN may properly observe Decoration Day this paper is issued on Wednesday instead of Thursday this week, which accounts for the lack of local news appearing in its columns. The Decoration Day articles, however, which will be found on page eight, make up the deficiency in this respect.

Dr. John E. Legge, who took a post-graduate course of nearly three months in surgery at one of the New York hospitals, returned to Oakland Monday morning and has resumed his practice here. While in New York Dr. Legge witnessed and also assisted in preforming some extremely delicate operations, thus gaining practice as well as experience and consequently his knowledge of surgery is greatly enlarged.

Mr. James Myers, of near Sunnyside, was in Oakland yesterday on his way home from a visit to Ohio, and made this office a brief visit. Mr. Myers stated that during his life time of seventy years, which he has spent in this part of the country, the present spring is the coldest and most backward in his recollection. Other old-time residents quite agree with Mr. Myers in his statement.

All honor to the man who earns his living by honest toil. He, it is, above all others, who is always pulling for better things. He is always on the front seat of the community band wagon. He is the first resident to greet the stranger and tell him that he is visiting the best town in the state. He is ready to fight, at the drop of a hat, the fellow who willingly runs down the community's best along with its worst, and there is something inspiring in his cordial invitation to the chronic croaker to "move somewhere else."

Mrs, Nannie Burke has purchased for the sum of $6000 the Bolden-West property fronting on Second street at the intersection of Liberty street, upon which is now erected a two-story frame building, the lower story being occupied by merchants and others and the upper floor as flats. Mrs. Burke, so it is reported, contemplates adding another story to the building and extending it back a considerable distance, when she will open a hotel for the accommodation of the traveling public.

MEET NEXT YEAR AT MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Grand Castle Knights of the Golden Eagle.

The Grand Castle of the state of Maryland, Knights of the Golden Eagle convened in Fisher's Hall in Frostburg at nine o'clock Monday morning. Grand Chief Peter Lammert presided.

The weather was unfavorable to the picnic which was to be held at the Y.M.I. Park. The order headed by the German Arion band paraded to the park but were obliged to remore their supplies from there to the Gladstone Annex where the picnic was held in the afternoon and at night.

It was decided to hold the next annual meeting at Mountain Lake Park.

Knights of Pythias Go A-Visiting.

Tuesday afternoon about thirty members of Garrett Lodge No. 113, Knight of Pythias, went from Oakland to Rowesburg, West Va., where they conferred the exemplified rank of Knight upon a number of new members of the Rowlesburg lodge, degree team from the Oakland lodge doing the work. Lodges located at Grafton, Newburg, Tunnelton, Terra Alta and other nearby points were represented. The local Knights who went to Rowesburg were Messrs A. T. Matthews, Joseph Rathbun, William Newman, Charles J. Newman, R. Harry West, William Lawton, Arthur Lawton, W. D. Dixon, Gene Baumgartner, Erbie Lantz, F. J. Schroeder, Roy Winters' H. M. ## BITTINGER.

Melchor Hetriech is the big man in our town this week, and his jolly good humor is due, as he tells his friends, to the fact that a new boy came to his home on last Sunday morning who is destined "to become the pride of pape's life."

Sheriff Albert Lee of Oakland, was a plesant caller in this village last week.

Prof. Loraditch, of the Grantsville Manual Training school, passed through here last Sunday afternoon.

School Commissioner Geo. E. Bishoff was visiting the normal School at this place on Friday of last week.

Miss Clara Slabach, of Sunnyside is visiting her sister, Mrs. Melchor Hetriech, at this place for a few days.

Luther Ralston, who is employed at Johnstown, Pa., was visiting his mother and home folks here last Monday.

Mrs. Thomas Hendershot and little daughter, are visiting Mrs. Hendershot's mother, Mrs. Sally Ralston, this week.

Mr. Oliver Boyer, of Salisbury, Pa., was the guest of his sister Mrs. Cuninghan, at this place last Sunday and Monday. Mr. Boyer is a well known and respected citizen of Salisbury, Pa., and is very active and entertaining inspite of his 82 years. His sister, Mrs. Cunningham, is in her 86th year and still retains much vigor.

Rev. J. B. Shoup was hastilly called from Meadow Mountain last Monday afternoon to the bedside of a child in the home of George Wilt, that was critically ill.

A young son of Mr, and Mrs. Harrison Bittinger, died on last Friday morning after a very painful illness. The funeral took place the following day.

$25 Reward.

Twenty-five dollars reward will be paid for information that will lead to the arrest and conviction of the party or parties who broke and carried away the water pipes, spigots, etc., from the Lambert, Shelleberger and Haywood cottages located in the suburbs of Oakland. ## FIKE.

Last week we had some cold weather for the time of year, and the result was a couple of heavy frosts. The latter part of the week was warmer with considerarble rain.

L. K. Fike is making preparations to make his weekly trip to Fearer.

Mr. Wm. H. H. Friend was in this section last week making surveys.

Wm. H. Thomas and son are cutting timber preparatory to erecting a new barn.

Mrs. Ida B. Marshall, of Uniontown, Pa., is in this section visiting her parents and friends.

Frank Bower and son George are preparing for the erection of a new barn.

Mr. John H. Thomas was calling on Wm. H. Thomas one day last week.

Mrs. Emma and Bertha Thomas were at F. T. Fike's one day last week.

It is reported that John H. Thomas sold his farm to Mr. Roy Chisholm, of Hinebaugh, Md., for the sum of $3,800. Whether it is a true report or not I can not say at present.

Wm. H. Thomas sold some timber to Mr. John Hileman, of Markleysburg, Pa.

It is said that John R. Fike took a chew of tobacco that cost him $1,000,000. If this be true I would not like to furnish him tobacco.

Mr. Isaac Frey, one of the employers on Mr. John Hileman's saw mill, is more popular than any other man on the mill for he has plenty of visitors at the mill.

Mr. Owen Evans was hauling lumber from Hileman's saw mill.

CARTER.

We would be glad to see all children grow to useful manhood and womanhood. They should be trained along the lines of industry. In short the home ought to be a sort of school for manual traning, that through this useful occupation the real bent of the child's mind might be readly preceived. Not all work, neither all play, but enough of both to make work and pleasure alike enjoyable and refreshing. Thus the child might be trained in useful ways and obtain physical vigor now almost impossible by the usual strain put on the child inclined to studious habits.

The Prospector.

By FRANK H. SWEET.

Copyright, 1906, by Frank H. Sweet.

BRENTWOOD, prospector, struggled up until he came to a sharp spur, around which he was flattening himself to pass, when he saw a man just beyond crouching over a crevice from which grew some twisted roots tipped by green leaves. He was holding the point of a pick in his hands and was apparently trying to pry out the roots. As Brent appeared the man sprang to his feet, his face expressing startled fright, followed almost instantly by anger.

"What ye doin' here?" he demanded fiercely.

"Prospecting," Brent answered.

The man's hands tightened convulsively upon the pick, and he seemed half minded to spring forward and use it as a weapon. Then his hands relaxed.

"Well, he threatened, "ye mosey back jest as fast 's the Lord 'll let ye. If ye don't"—

"Oh, tut, tut, man!" interrupted Brent carelessly. "This is too large a country for one person to monopolize. What you digging those roots for—to eat?"

The man only glared.

"Yes, I see you are," affably. "I've been crowded down to them myself before now. But they're not fit for a coyote to chew on except to keep off starvation—though, if you'll excuse me you look as if you'd had roots as a steady diet for quite a spell. But see here," suddenly, "suppose you come down to my camp in front of the big cave. I'm laying out for a regular down east supper tonight, with everything but pie, and I'd like you to join me. We might explore the cave afterward by torchlight. It looked interestingly risky. But why"—

He did not finish the sentence, for the man had suddenly choked out an imprecation and was now hurrying in the opposite direction, stumbling and muttering as he ran. Brent looked after him pityingly.

"Loony," he thought. "Prospected till he got out of provisions and then went crazy. Poor fellow!"

He returned to camp soberly. The water was now boiling merrily, and he poured into it nearly a quart of white beans. They would do for his morrow's dinner, as he wished to spend the entire day prospecting.

Several generous slices of ham were cut and spread in a frying pan and with them half a dozen eggs. Then he opened a package of bacon and peeled and sliced the onions and made the coffee. The air was soon fragrant with their cooking, and above all the rest rose the rich, pungent smell of the onions.

Several times during the preparations for supper Brent thought he heard noises from the growth above the cave, but attributed them to a prowling bear or panther. As the supper progressed, however, and the odors grew stronger the noises increased. Suddenly he was startled to his feet by a hoarse cry:

HE WAS HOLDING A PICK IN HIS HAND.

"Good Lord, men! I can't stand it no longer. That's worth all the gold in Alaska."

"Right ye are, pard!" came another voice, savage with repressed longing. "Let's mosey. I'm goin' to have a bite o' that or die."

There was a pushing aside of the bushes, and three figures came plunging and falling down the declivity, apparently to their destruction, though they checked the fall somewhat by grasping at occasional bushes and fissures. In an instant, it seemed, they were standing beside the campfire, wild, dishevelled, fierce. In one of them Brent recognized the root eater of a half hour before.

"Got any more o' that grub, mate?" demanded the larger of them, a gaunt giant with white hair and beard that covered his shoulders.

"Plenty," responded Brent, recovering himself quickly. "I allowed for enough to meet a good appetite two days, but it won't be anywhere now. Here, you fellows look pretty hungry. Suppose you sit down and help yourselves while I'm cooking a new lot; then I'll join you."

Simultaneously and without a word the three reached for the fried onions. When the new lot was ready the old was entirely done, even to the last scrap of bacon rind, and the three were watching Brent's skillful movements with ravenous but appreciative eyes. Not until their appetites were entirely satisfied and they had moved back, wiping their mouths upon their hands, did one of them speak. Then the white haired giant nodded sociably to Brent.

"Prospectin'?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Well, slowly, "I reckon we'll have to let ye in—on a small lay, mebbe. After eatin' that supper we couldn't plan for nothin' hostile. How much grub ye got?"

"A three months' allowance for one man."

"That's three weeks for four men, or a month, mebbe, with moderation. Plenty, I guess, to carry us through."

Brent smiled sarcastically.

"Don't you think it might be a good idea to ask my consent first?" he asked.

"We're three men, an' you ain't but one," composedly. "Though, of course, that don't matter now. After the supper we couldn't be hostile. Anyway, ye'll be ready to come in all right, even on the smallest lay, soon's ye know. Seems odd, don't it"—reflectively—"but jest the smell o' that supper was all that saved your life. Oh, I don't mind tellin' now," at the inquiry in Brent's eyes, "long 's ye come in this cave an' Dikker there heard ye speak 'bout explorin' it. That left but one thing for us to do. We was hid up there with our guns p'inted, an' we was goin' to give ye ten minutes to pack up an' git. If ye didn't, an' from what Dikker said we knowed ye wouldn't, we was goin' to shoot. There wouldn't be nothin' else we could do," earnestly.

"Well, I had my gun p'inted an' mouth open to holler when I got a full smell o' them ham an' eggs right in my throat, an' I waited a little to git one more smell, with my mouth wide open when the onions come up. Lord," smacking his lips reminiscently, "I've lived seventy years, an' I never had another second like that in all my life. I jest laid my gun down an' stuck my nose out fur's I could; then I felt 'shamed an' looked round. But Dikker's nose an' Sam's nose was both stickin' out jest the same. That finished us. We couldn't 'a' stayed up there another minute for all the gold in these mountains. It's been ten weeks—ten whole weeks—since we swallered our last bit o' pork, an' in all that time we ain't had a thing but roots b'iled to chaw on."

"Ten weeks!" exclaimed Brent in amazement. "Why, man alive, I once lived on them two days and thought I'd starve. Why didn't one of you go out after provisions?"

"Dassent," laconically. "They's too many prospectors round watchin'. They can tell from the size of a man's eyes what he's found. We have a spot where we can pick up gold with our fingers, an' we'd ruther starve than take chances. But I reckon we four can git it all out in a month, an' you can have an eighth share from now on. An'—oh, yes, my name's Moses, thirty-nine years prospectin' an' never struck it rich till now. Who might you be?"

"My name's Brent Harlan, ten years prospectin', but going home soon now."

A week later they were gathered around the campfire. It was after supper, and they had all been smoking, but now the pipes were laid aside, and they were gazing into the fire. Prospecting days were nearly over for them.

Into eyes that had grown hard with gold seeking were coming new expressions of tenderness and joy. But the face of Moses was grave.

"Thirty-nine years of prospectin'," he said at last, breaking the silence, "an' now at seventy ready to quit, with not a kith or kin or friend in the world save you three to look glad. 'Tain't goin' to be so blame fine as I thought.

"You've all got somebody," he went on presently. "I can see it in your eyes an' in the way you smile to yourselves. I've never had nobody in all my life, not one. The fust thing I remember was bein' an orphan an' fightin' for my grub. Now I'm goin' to ask you to sheer your homes with me for a half hour or so. I've been watchin' you an' thinkin' it over. We'll be sayin' goodby in a few weeks an' mebbe won't never see each other ag'in. Won't you sheer your wives an' babies with me for a little while? You've got letters an' photographs, an' ye can tell me what they do an' say an' how they look. It'll be something for me to think about arter we separate."

"I don't mind," said Dikker. He drew a package from his pocket, worn and soiled by much handling, and took from it the photograph of a middle aged woman, which he passed across to Moses. Then he read his letters through, one by one, slowly.

"We've been married thirty-two years," he said as he finished, "an' there's only jest we two. But Lizzy's the best woman on God's earth. I was a carder in a cotton mill, an' Lizzy worked in the weave shop. She works in the weave shop now. It'll be a great thing for me to go back with money enough to set her up so she won't have to work another blessed day in all her life."

"I've got a whole passle," said Sam in answer to Moses' inquiring look. "There's seven children, an' the last letter said the baby was goin' to be married. She wa'n't but 'eleven when I left home. All the other children are married an' got families, an' I have a whole lot o' brothers an' sisters with families. I reckon they're all poor too. They used to be. Lord! Lord, won't it be fun to take enough money home to set 'em all up," with a big, breezy laugh. "But wait till ye hear their letters," and he drew a huge package from his pocket, which he opened proudly.

When they were all read Moses turned to Brent.

"What a thing 'tis to have folks," he said wistfully. "I don't see how anybody can leave 'em an' come to a place like this. I s'pose you've got somebody too?"

"Yes," Brent answered. "I have the dearest old mother in the world."

He selected several letters from a number which he drew from his pocket and read them through slowly. The last paragraph ran: "And now, dear boy, take the best care you can of yourself and don't worry about me. I have kept up the farm and paid off $100 on the $2,000 mortgage. It isn't much in ten years, I suppose, but it's something, and I have kept up all the expenses. Next year I hope to do better. I wish you were near enough for me to look after your stocking and things. It'll be nice when we're together again, won't it? But don't come till you're ready. I saw Alice last week, and she's looking well."

"WILLIN', BOY!" HE CRIED HOARSELY. "WE'LL DRIVE YE OFF."

"Who's Alice?" asked Moses sympathetically. Your wife?"

"No, not yet," Brent answered softly. He hesitated a little, but the look in the old man's eyes made him open Alice's letters and read them, too, only omitting a few of the most endearing sentences. The last letter closed with: "I saw your mother the other day, Brent, and she is beginning to look old, but, oh, so strong and patient and full of faith in you. I would not have you mar your future in any way through my impatience, dear heart, but if you could arrange to come home, even on a visit, before long it would do her so much good. But you know best."

They had all listened attentively. The old man's hand was shading his eyes.

"An' ye could leave a girl like that an' a mother like that an' stay here ten years!" he broke out disgustedly.

Brent was already on his feet, thrusting the letter back into his pocket with quick, determined hands.

"I know it," he replied huskily, "but I won't be any longer. I shall start back at once, tonight. My week's work will pay enough for the grub stake and to get me home. If mother could pay a little on the mortgage I can surely make a living for them, and they will be glad to see me. That is," recollecting himself suddenly, "if you are willing to let me go. I promised to stay with you until we cleaned out the deposit, so legally I haven't any share yet. If you're willing, though," his voice trembling, "you may keep all the provisions, except just enough to get me out, and all my share, except a little for the grub stake and to get me home. I don't ask any more."

Moses was on his feet, his eyes gleaming from under their shaggy brows.

"Willin', boy!" he cried hoarsely. "We'll drive ye off. Dikker, bring out the dust an' nuggets we've put in the cache the past week an' give this boy his sheer. It'll be a little over $10,000, I know, from the way it hefted. The grub stake will call for half, but seein' we've got most of it we'll pay that, an' we'll pay for his ticket home. The boy must git to that farm with $10,000. 'Tain't much, but it'll sort o' help him to git started, an' he can work. An', now, there's the weddin' presents. Here, Dikker, bring that stuff to me," as the man returned, staggering under the weight of his load. "Jest watch what I take an' count it from my sheer. Now," selecting nugget after nugget and passing them to Brent, "you give these to the girl Alice from me an' tell her I wish a new joy to go with every one of 'em. An'—an'"—his voice hesitating a little—"if she'd be willin' to write me a line, like as if she was folks, I'd be mighty proud."

"She will write you a long letter, and be glad to," cried Brent heartily, "and so will I. But you mustn't send all this. Why, it's more than half as much as you say I must take."

"An' what o' that?" aggressively. "Ain't ye willin' the girl Alice should have something?"

"Of course, but"—

"Then shet up. Now, Dikker an' Sam, pony up yer presents."

Dikker and Sam passed their offerings of nuggets to Brent, grinning. He gazed from them to the men, the moisture from his eyes now slipping down his cheeks.

"Thank you," he said huskily. "Alice's fortune will be a good deal larger than mine."

"Of course 'twill," retorted Moses, "an' why not? A girl never ought to be dependin' on a man an' have to ask him for money. It ought to be right t'other way. If there's any borryin' the man should go to the girl. Now shet up yer thankin' an' git ready. Hurry 'bout it too. Then we're goin' to drive ye off."

THE HARD TIMES 'LL GIT YOU.

[With apologies, of course.]

Mr. Edward Harriman is filling with dismay,
Says we're rollin' onward to a dark an' bitter day,
Says he's full o' shivers an' he's most tremendous skeered
'Cause there maybe won't be any more lambs to be sheared.
First he gave a whisper, but today he gives a shout—
The hard times 'll git you if you don't watch out!

Mr. Rockefeller's got a new congestive chill;
Clamped a double lock upon his money box an' till;
Looks into the future, an' he can't see no relief;
Fears that you an' me are far upon the way to grief;
Combs his wig an' murmurs in a voice that's full of doubt,
The hard times 'll git you if you don't watch out!

Lawson's in a frenzy with his articles an' ads.;
Warns us that the system's got the money of our dads;
Creeps right up behind us till his breath is on our neck,
Then he hisses hoarsely that we's bound to have a wreck;
Begs don't hock your jewels or you'll hustle up the spout—
The hard times 'll git you if you don't watch out!

Better save your money an' be keerful what you spend,
Pay back what you borrow an' look out for what you lend;
Put away your pennies an' git friendly with your job;
Old Hard Times is knockin' an' is turnin' at the knob.
Don't go livin' splendid till you're crippled with the gout—
The hard times 'll git you if you don't watch out!

—Wilbur D. Nesbit in Chicago Evening Post.

The Green Eyed Monster.

Washerwoman (to poet)—I hope you won't write any more love poems on your cuffs. My husband is beginning to be jealous.—Meggendorfer Blatter.

Wouldn't Interrupt the Argument.

Down in Cocaran, Ga., the affairs of civil justice are administered by Judge Edwards, who is also an enthusiastic farmer. One cloudy spring afternoon court was convened to try a peculiarly tortuous and perplexing case. Judge Edwards listened, with growing unrest. He was observed at last to seize a slip of paper, scribble a few words, place the document beneath a heavy paperweight and reach for his hat.

"Captain," he called cheerily, "excuse me fur interruptin' you, suh. You go right on with your argument, which is a darned good one. It's suah goin' to rain this evenin', gentlemen, an' I got to set out my potatoes right away. But you go right on, captain! When you an' the major get through you-all 'll find my decision under this heah paperweight."

The door closed upon an astonished orator.—Nashville Banner.

Couldn't Answer.

Mr. Brown is daffy on the subject of scientific problems, but his wife has no sympathy with him in this direction.

The other evening he laid down his paper and remarked to his wife:

"That's odd."

"What?" she inquired.

"Why, the statement that it would take 12,000,000 years to pump the sea dry at the rate of 1,000 gallons a second."

She thought over the statement profoundly for a few seconds and then innocently asked:

"Where would they put all the water?"—Harper's Weekly.

Too Much.

First College Graduate—I hear you have a job. What doing?

Second College Graduate—Oh, running errands, cleaning ink wells, and so forth."

"Like it?"

"First rate—that is, until my employer had the nerve to ask me out to his house to dinner. It's pretty tough to have to associate with your social inferiors out of business hours."—New York Life.

Continual Scheming.

They were calling on the garret bard.

"And I suppose it is essential that you poets should have wonderful imaginations?" ventured the pretty girl.

"Well, I should say so," replied the poet as he dashed off another spring sonnet. "If we didn't have wonderful imaginations we could never create the yarns we tell our creditors when they come around looking for money."—Puck.

Out of the Question.

"But," said Hammer, "if your wife treats you so badly, why don't you get a divorce from her?"

"Oh, gracious," replied Henpeck, "I wouldn't dare ask her for that! I'm sure she wouldn't give it to me."—Philadelphia Press.

The Regulation Of Incorporated Capital.

By President JACOB GOULD SCHURMAN of Cornell University.

THE regulation of consolidated and INCORPORATED CAPITAL is likely to be the problem of American politics for the next few decades. No thoughtful man acquainted with the lessons of human history can survey the prospect which stretches before us without DEEP ANXIETY. It took a great civil war extending over four years, with a sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of lives and an expenditure of millions of money, to dispose of the constitutional issue on which American political parties formerly divided.

Now that the contest of our parties is waged over economic questions with corporations, indeed, in the foreground, but with the demand for A MORE EQUAL DISTRIBUTION of worldly goods in the distance and the specter of socialism hovering just beyond the horizon, what eye but the eye of Omniscience can divine whither and to what we are drifting?

Yet we cannot idly fold our hands or, like cowards, retreat. Whether we will or not, we MUST face and solve the politico-economic problems thrust upon us. But everything depends on THE WAY in which we attempt the task and THE SPIRIT in which we go about it. The safety of states lies in the wisdom, the justice, the moderation and the civic righteousness of their citizens.

IF THESE FAIL US, THE DOOM OF OUR REPUBLIC IS WRITTEN IN THE HISTORY OF ROME.

In all the vast and varied panorama of the history of mankind I know nothing so full of interest AND INSTRUCTION for this generation of American people as the later days of the Roman republic—the century of the Gracchi, of Marius and Sulla, of Crassus and Cato, of Pompey and Julius Cæsar.

When the older Gracchus appeared on the scene, Rome was still a republic which had undergone transformation from the earlier city-state, with its centuries of courage, civic virtue and GREAT ACHIEVEMENT. Rome had become a world power and was bearing the responsibilities and the burdens of empire.

Her population was no longer a race of farmers; her citizens left the soil and crowded into the cities. The blood of the native stock had become diluted with a foreign strain. The state itself was distracted by a contest between the popular Comitia and a senatorial oligarchy in which each claimed and strove to secure SUPREME SOVEREIGNTY.

Unhappily for Rome, a self constituted savior of society apperred who had eyes to see that the times were out of joint and conceit to believe that he was born to set them right. He was a man of impulsive temperament, who brooked no opposition to his will and who could not even appreciate a SINCERE DIFFERENCE OF OPINION in an honest opponent.

Vain, self confident, reckless, autocratic, he was also THOROUGHLY HONEST and deeply persuaded of his own good intentions. And, as fate would have it, he possessed the gift of eloquent speech. This man, who thought himself forcordained by the gods to be the regenerator of Rome, was Tiberius Gracchus.

His reforms resulted in riot and massacre, in which the reformer himself miserably perished. But his policy of confiscation without compensation launched the state upon a century of civil war and ruthless proscription, which ended in the overthrow of the republic and the soulless despotism of the Cæsars.

Thus ended the first historic attempt of political parties to solve great economic problems. Yet Tiberius Gracchus is not to be blamed for recognizing and facing these problems.

THE AGRARIAN QUESTION, INVOLVING THE PROPER RELATIONS OF THE SMALL CULTIVATORS AND THE BIG CAPITALISTS, HAD TO BE FOUGHT OUT IN THE ROME OF THAT DAY AS THE RELATIONS OF PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATIONS TO CONSUMERS AND THE PUBLIC MUST BE SETTLED HERE AND NOW.

The historical results would have been entirely different had not Tiberius Gracchus lacked a just sense of reality, a knowledge of business and a perception of the dominance of NATURAL LAW in the sequence of economic phenomena and had he not injected into a grave and complex question of Roman politics a personality of boundless self confidence, equally impatient of opposition and incapable of JUDICIAL INVESTIGATION and consideration.

The Great Problem of Charity.

By JACOB H. SCHIFF, Multimillionaire New York Banker.

WHAT is to become of the enormous population that is coming to our shores FROM EVERYWHERE? What is to be its fate when this wave of prosperity begins to recede? Are we not inviting suffering? And how are we going to relieve it?

THE CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS SHOULD STAND TOGETHER.

Those who have opposed the federation of charities have for the moment gained the day. I do not doubt the charity of these persons, but I for one believe that federation is the only plan that can combat the ERA OF SUFFERING that is upon us.

I am not a pessimist, nor am I an alarmist, but I want to say we have a GRAVE UNDERTAKING on our hands. The time is coming when we will have to support charities in a much larger way than we are doing now. What are we DOING in the way of relieving the sufferings of mankind that entitles us to sit in our palatial mansions? Are we GOING OUT to relieve the suffering around us?

THESE ARE THE QUESTIONS WE SHOULD ASK OURSELVES AT THIS TIME.

Soldiers Who Were Afraid.

By WALTER JAMES JANES.

[Copyright, 1907, by C. N. Lurie.]

HE SAW THIRTY BRAVES.

ABOUT ten years ago a veteran of the civil war visited the battlefield of Wilson creek in Missouri, where one of the earliest important battles of the war was fought. He was observed to be intently inspecting the stony ground on Bloody hill, where General Nathaniel Lyon, the Union commander, was killed in the fight of Aug. 10, 1861.

"What on earth air you lookin' fur?" inquired a farmer who lived near by.

"Me?" replied the searcher. "Oh, I'm jist a-lookin' fur my false teeth."

"Where did you drop 'em?" asked the farmer, supposing that the visitor had just lost his teeth.

"Well, it wuz right 'long here somewheres," said the veteran. "I wuz so bad scairt when I fust went into action here in '61 that my upper plate shook clean outen my head, an' I been a-needin' them teeth ever sence."

The late Stephen Crane in the story which made his reputation as a writer, "The Red Badge of Courage," drew a picture of the impressions of a youth in his first battle which many veterans have declared is a faithful portrayal of their own feelings in a similar experience. This young man went into the fight determined not to show the white feather, but as the battle waxed warm he was seized in the grip of a terrible fear and suddenly took to his heels and made for the rear.

It is quite probable that if you will corner any old soldier and pin him down to absolute candor he will tell you that he was "scared to death," or words to that effect, when first he heard the hostile bullets whiz and knew that he must go forward into the conflict.

General Grant candidly confessed to a highly uncomfortable feeling upon two occasions of imminent battle, one being his first experience in the Mexican war and the other his initiation in the civil war after fifteen years of peace. He recorded these sensations in his personal memoirs. As to his experience in Mexico he wrote:

> As we lay in our tents upon the seashore the artillery at the fort on the Rio Grande could be distinctly heard. The war had begun. There was no possible means of obtaining news from the garrison, and information from outside could not be otherwise than unfavorable. What General Taylor's feelings were during this suspense I do not know, but for myself, a young second lieutenant who had never heard a hostile gun before, I felt sorry that I had enlisted. A great many men, when they smell battle afar off, chafe to get into the fray. When they say so themselves they generally fail to convince their hearers that they are as anxious as they would like to make believe, and as they approach danger they become more subdued. This rule is not universal, for I have known a few men who were always aching for a fight when there was no enemy near who were as good as lit for it when the battle did come, but the number of such men is small.

After several years' retirement from the army Grant entered the great conflict of the sixties, his first command being the Twenty-first Illinois volunteers. He was sent to northwest Missouri, where a certain regiment was besieged by the enemy, with instructions to raise the siege. He wrote as follows:

> My sensations as we approached what might be "a field of battle" were anything but agreeable. I had been in all the engagements in Mexico that it had been possible for one person to be in, but not in command. If some one else had been colonel and I had been lieutenant colonel, I do not think I would have felt any trepidation. Before we were prepared to cross the Mississippi river at Quincy my anxiety was relieved, for the men of the besieged regiment came straggling into town. I am inclined to think both sides got frightened and ran away.

A few days later Colonel Grant had an experience which once more caused him, in his memoirs, to acknowledge that he was scared. This was after he had crossed the river into Missouri. His description of his feelings just in advance of an expected battle that did not take place has a touch of humor. This humor is quite justifiable, for the regiment of the future general was encamped at the time in the little village of Florida, Mo., the birthplace of Mark Twain, and that individual himself, then better known in the neighborhood as Sam Clemens, who had just enlisted in the Confederate service, was doing his best to avoid an engagement with Grant, as he confessed many years later. There was a Colonel Harvey Lilley Grant, he was with General Taylor's army. He evidently was a young man of some sentiment, for it seems to have been his sweetheart's picture that nerved him for battle when his heart, physically speaking, had failed him. In his account of this initial experience in conflict he tells of his command crossing a lagoon and pausing to dip cups of water. Just beyond, up and over the bank, the battle was raging. Longstreet's courage wavered, but this is what he did:

> I thought of her whom I had left behind, drew her daguerreotype from my breast pocket, had a glimpse of her charming smile and with quickened spirits mounted the bank.

In Memory of General Lawton.

By DANIEL B. SKITT.

[Copyright, 1907, by T. E. McGrath.]

MEMORIAL DAY in Indianapolis this year is made memorable by the unveiling of a statue of Major General Henry Ware Lawton. President Roosevelt participating. General Lawton was the most conspicuous victim of the war in the Philippines. He was killed during a battle at San Mateo, near Manila, Dec. 19, 1899.

The statue is a bronze figure of General Lawton in uniform. Daniel Chester French of New York and Andrew O'Conner, now living in Paris, were the sculptors. The statue and stone pedestal cost between $25,000 and $30,000, raised by popular subscription, most of it from friends and admirers of General Lawton in Indiana, his home state. The movement to erect the memorial was started shortly after the death of the general.

The career of General Lawton makes a brilliant page in American military history. For thirty-seven years he was a soldier of the United States. He served in the civil war, in the Spanish-American war, in the Filipino uprising and through several severe Indian campaigns on the western plains. He was what is sometimes described as a born soldier. In fact, he never followed any other calling.

Just a week after the attack on Fort Sumter in 1861 Henry W. Lawton enlisted in the volunteer service. He was but seventeen years of age. His first service was as a private and corporal in an Indiana infantry regiment. He was promoted rapidly for soldierly qualities. Congress voted him a medal of honor for gallantry in action in the fighting before Atlanta in 1864. Before the end of the war he was a brevet colonel. When the war closed, Colonel Lawton retired for a few months. In July, 1866, he entered the regular army as a second lieutenant in an infantry regiment. He remained in the regular army until his death by a Filipino bullet more than thirty-three years later. At the time of his death his rank in the regular army was that of a colonel, but the war department clerks at Washington were preparing his commission as a brigadier general in the regular service when the news reached the department that he had been killed in battle.

In 1871 Lawton was transferred to the Fourth cavalry. He fought the Sioux, the Utes and other hostile Indian tribes and in 1886 performed one of the most notable exploits in plains warfare history by rounding up and capturing a fierce Apache chief, old Geronimo, who had given the government more trouble than any other Indian on record. General Miles selected Captain Lawton to lead an expedition of picked men into Mexico against Geronimo and his band of bloodthirsty Apaches. Lawton visited the chief in his camp and planned for his surrender. This was one of the most daring ventures in Indian war annals. Some of the older army officers still discuss it with wonder.

At Santiago Lawton, with the rank of brigadier general of volunteers, commanded the second division of the Fifth army corps, doing valuable service in the several engagements leading to the capture of the Cuban city. He was made a major general of volunteers less than a week after the fall of Santiago for gallantry at El Caney.

General Lawton's service in the Philippines was notably brilliant. He began his work there early in 1899. In February he was placed in command at Manila. He immediately became a campaigner with the object of capturing General Aguinaldo, the Filipino leader. It was much like the Indian fighting with which Lawton was familiar. Valenzuela" [illegible] forces, the Filipinos [illegible] in the jungles [illegible] in any body. General Lawton [illegible] San Isidro, the capital of the Filipino government at the time, and chased Aguinaldo from place to place.

About the middle of December the general led a force of something more than a thousand soldiers against a Filipino stronghold at the town of San Mateo, fifteen miles from Manila. General Lawton and his staff made the trip on horseback in one night over almost impassable mountains in a heavy rainstorm. The horses slipped and slid down the hills and ravines, and the men arrived on the river bank opposite San Mateo drenched and muddy, but full of fighting spirit.

When the engagement began, General Lawton, wearing a white helmet and a yellow raincoat, was a conspicuous target. He was, in fact, the most conspicuous target in the army, being six feet three inches tall and a large man at that. He insisted against the advice of his staff, upon going on the firing line. He was standing in front of the firing line, the men being prone in the grass, when one of his staff officers observed that the Filipino sharpshooters were trying to pick the general off. Bullets struck the ground near his feet. The staff officer remonstrated with the general for exposing himself, but Lawton's well known contempt for bullets caused him to regard the warning lightly. A little later he cried "I am shot!" and clutched at his breast. He fell into the arms of the officer and died instantly.

General Lawton's body was borne to the rear and placed in a clump of bushes while the men continued the fight, dispersed the enemy and took possession of the town. Many of the soldiers wept when they learned of their commander's death. He was the only American killed in the fight, though several of the officers and men were wounded.

The death of General Lawton caused profound sorrow throughout the army. He had been known for nearly forty years as one of the most fearless fighters in the service. Next to General Custer, who fell in the awful fight on the Little Big Horn in 1876, Lawton was esteemed the most daring fighter on the plains. A grateful country is proud to honor him. The president of the United States, who watched Lawton at El Caney and Santiago and knew his worth from personal observation, was proud to accept the invitation from the citizens of Indianapolis to take part in the unveiling of the memorial.

General Weston's Exploit.

General John F. Weston, who many years later became commissary general of subsistence, [illegible] in 1901. He captured a Cuban to transport on the Filipinos [illegible] Alabama. With six followers, each man having his revolver stuffed on top of his head to keep the powder dry, he swam into the stream and took the custody of the transport prisoner through a clever ruse. This deed made him a medal of honor man.

The Civil War At a Glance.

By WALTON WILLIAMS.

THE American civil war was the greatest conflict at arms in the history of the human race. The American Revolutionary war, which lasted nearly twice as long, was a series of mere skirmishes compared with the struggle of the early sixties. Battles were fought during the civil war, now known only to the maniest of historians or to local tradition or recollection, which exceeded in the forces engaged and surpassed in the carnage resulting some of the most important actions during the struggle for independence. The number of battles fought greatly exceeded the number incident to any single European war. The firing line was a thousand miles long. Nearly 4,000,000 men were engaged. More than 500,000 men were killed in action or died from wounds or disease. In practically every respect the war of 1861-65 was the biggest and bloodiest of all time.

This stupendous struggle embraced so many ramifications of incident that a complete history of the whole is utterly impossible. Historians have been able only to "hit the high spots" for want of space and lack of time and endurance to sift and chronicle all the interesting facts.

We do not know even how many battles were fought. This can be only approximated. In the government's "Chronological List of Battles" the number exceeds 2,200. But the bureau of pensions has an alphabetical list of engagements, including skirmishes and such other minor actions as were deemed sufficiently important to note. This list contains more than 6,800 engagements.

About 2,800,000 Union soldiers were enlisted during the war. The Confederate records are very incomplete, many of them having been lost or destroyed. It is estimated that the numbers engaged on that side of the conflict were not far short of 700,000 men. These figures do not include the considerable numbers of irregular combatants on each side, many of whom were not officially enrolled.

War department records show 359,528 deaths from all causes in the Union armies during the war. In proportion to strength of forces engaged the Confederate losses were equally severe. In the absence of definite records any estimate, however, must be a mere guess. In the Union armies 67,058 men were killed in battle, 43,012 died of wounds received in action, and 224,586 died of disease incident to service. Of those killed in battle 4,142 were commissioned officers. The number of Union men who died while prisoners of war was 29,498. United States military authorities executed 267 men and would have executed many more but for the humane intervention of Abraham Lincoln. The Confederates executed four officers and sixty men of the Union forces.

It is a most remarkable fact that in the four years of this mighty conflict only one man was executed for "political" reasons by a Union general. In New Orleans a man named Mumford pulled down a flag of the United States after the city had been captured, but before it was occupied by the Federal forces. General Benjamin F. Butler, who was in command of the occupying force, caused Mumford to be hanged.

Where Lincoln Put the Whetstone.

A soldier at whose home when a boy Lincoln paused in his tramps in Illinois and who lent him a whetstone to sharpen his jackknife met him during the war in Washington. Lincoln spoke of using the whetstone.

"Ya-a-s," drawled out the old soldier. "Whatever did you do with the whetstone? I never could find it. We 'lowed mebbe you took it along with you." "No, no! I put it on top of the gatepost that high one." "Mebbe you did. Nobody else could have reached it, and none of us ever thought to look there for it." There it was found where it was placed fifteen years before. The soldier reported the fact to the president.

KICKED BY HORSE; DIED TWO DAYS LATER.

Samuel White, An Aged Resident of the County, Met With Fatal Mishap.

On Decoration Day, last Thursday, May 30th, Mr. Samuel White, an old and highly respected resident of District No. 8, residing on top of Backbone mountain, near the White Church, was so badly injured by being kicked by his horse that his death ensued on Saturday morning.

Upon the day Mr. White was injured a large number of his friends and neighbors had been to the White Church where the graves of their dead were decorated. He accompanied his brother-in-law, Joseph King, home, and was in the act of removing the harness from his horse when the animal kicked, striking him in the right side and breaking several ribs. Mr. White was immediately taken into the home of Mr. King and a physician summoned who gave the injured man every attention. The following day Mr. White was removed to his home, but being an asthmatic an attack of this malady followed, and he died on Saturday, as above stated.

Another Thoroughbred Horse for Garrett.

The Bond and North Glade Stock Association has been formed by a number of the farmers residing near Swanton, among the members being Messrs. C. O. Wilt, Harvey Broadwater, Jonas Broadwater, William B. Broadwater, Ephraim Broadwater, Nelson Broadwater, Nicholas Paugh, Wm. M. Junkins, John A. Wilt, Charles Beckman and Salem Lee. These enterprising residents purchased one day last week from Messrs. Bond Brothers of this county an exceptionally fine, thoroughbred registered Percheron horse, which is considered by horsemen to be one of the finest specimens ever brought into these parts. The horse was bred and raised on Bond Brothers' Sugar Hill stock farm in Jefferson county, Pa., and will be used by the association for breeding purposes. The horse weighs 1800 pounds, is a steel gray in color and stands 18 hands high. Mr. W. M. Junkins is manager of the association and has the horse in keeping.

Grange Meeting.

The Garrett Pomona Grange met with the Elizabeth Grange at the Mason School House Saturday, May 25, 1907. The attendance was very good, considering the inclemency of the weather.

The people were entertained by speeches from Mr. Mason, Mr. Foreman and J. R. Browning. The next meeting of The Garrett Pomona Grange will be held at Short Run Saturday, June 29th.

CHANGE IN TRAIN SCHEDULE.

New Sunday Train From Fairmont to Deer Park and Return an Innovation.

The present train service on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which became effective Sunday morning at 12.01 o'clock, is the most satisfactory to the traveling public in a number of years, especially in respect to the Sunday trains.

Heretofore all accommodation trains were abandoned on Sundays, thus depriving many persons who were unable to get away from their business interests in nearby towns on Saturday in order to spend Sunday with their families either in Oakland, Deer Park or Mountain Lake Park, to take an early morning train from Fairmont or other western points. With the new schedule, however, an accommodation train leaves Fairmont about seven o'clock and reaches Oakland at ten o'clock. It runs as far east as Deer Park, returning from that point the same evening, arriving in Oakland at 7.26 and at Fairmont about ten o'clock.

With the exception of this train all others will arrive and depart at the same time as under the old schedule, with the exception of train No. 55, which comes here now at 3.33 p. m., instead of 2.11 p. m.

Beginning with last Sunday morning all trains stop at Deer Park and Mountain Lake Park, and will continue to do so until late in October, when the winter schedule will become effective.

Mr. Eckles to Manage "The Oakland."

Mr. G. W. Eckles of this city, will manage the Oakland Hotel, at Oakland, again this season, and the well known hostelry will open for the reception of guests on June 9th. Mr. Eckles and his estimable wife have brought "The Oakland" back to much of its one-time importance as a summer resort, during their two-year term as its managers, and the coming season looks bright with promise of liberal patronage. Should the season be a warm one "The Oakland" will doubtless prove a restful and appreciated stopping-place for parties who will attend the Exposition at Jamestown, and as Oakland is always patronized by many well known people of Eastern cities, it would seem that Mr. Eckles prospects are, if anything brighter than for any past season. The many friends of this popular family in this city will wish them abundant success as they go to Oakland for the remainder of the summer.—Grafton Republican.

Church Social.

The ladies of St Mark's Ev. Lutheran church, Oakland, will conduct a social in the basement of the church on next Tuesday evening, June 13th, to which all are cordially invited. Ice cream and other refreshments will be served.

JUNE TERM OF THE GARRETT CO. CIRCUIT COURT

Convened on Monday With Judge Henderson Presiding.

The June term of the Circuit Court for Garrett county begun on Monday morning last, with Judge Robert R. Henderson on the bench. Mr. Charles S. Davis was appointed foreman of the Grand Inquest and the following named persons were drawn from the jury box to serve on the Grand Jury for the term:

Mahlon Schooley, Isaac A. Ervin, Jonas Platter, Oliver C. Facenbaker, Thomas H. Bittinger, Wade Hinebaugh, James A. Fitzwater, G. W. Legge, Rudolph Faucett. Patrick E. Finzell, Jas. Chisholm, David F. Liller, Mahlon Glotfelty, Benj. F. Green, Wm. M. Sebold, John Speicher, Meshack Mattingly, Daniel T. Thayer, W. G. Riley, Charles E. White, Solomon Orendorff, James W. Dodge.

Charles J. Newman was excused for cause and Robert C. Wilson was returned mortuus est.

Judge Henderson then gave his charge to the Grand Jury as follows:

Gentlemen of the Grand Jury:

Few words, or none, are required from the Court to impress upon you the solemnity of your obligation. The terms of the oath you have taken are comprehensive and sufficient. A careful and conscientious observance of them will surely prevent any serious error on your part.

The spirit in which you approach your labors should be a judicial one, and that implies your leaving behind you all personal or private friendship, bias, interest, likes or dislikes. You are an important part of the Circuit Court, and have no small place in that most vital of the functions of civilized society—the administration of justice in accordance with law. If any of you have, as private citizens, looked with leniency or careless disregard upon the breaking of the law by your neighbors, it is now your sworn duty to abandon such an attitude of mind. You stand for the enforcement of law and its exact observance by all citizens. Nothing less than this will insure the safety of our institutions. A spirit of lawlessness in little things easily grows until the very structure of society is threatened, and individual will is set up against the collective will of organized government as expressed in law. Your service here will, no doubt, increase in your mind respect for the law and abhorrence of those who disregard it. If not you will have served ill your state and county.

Some of you are experienced in jury duty and will be able to help those who are new to it.

There are, I am glad to say, no serious or widespread conditions of disorder to call to your attention. So far as I can see, and without presuming to dictate to you, your session should not be prolonged. As the expense of the court terms is very great you will be expected to use all reasonable and proper diligence to make you as brief as the nature of your duties will allow.

The approved practice is to have your body organized by the selection of two clerks, one to keep a docket of cases and the other to take notes of the testimony. The State's Attorney, who will be your adviser, will explain the practice further to you.

As most of you know, your duty is not to pass on both sides of a case but on the state's side only. A consideration by you of the possible or probable defence to a charge of crime will be to impinge upon the functions of the petit jury. The approved rule for your guidance is this—if the evidence laid before you is sufficient to justify a conviction, supposing no evinence for the defence to be in existence, then you should indict. Stated in another form it is this—for the purpose of your inquiry there is no defence, but the evidence for the state must be sufficient to support a verdict of guilty. Unless there is enough for this, do not indict.

Twelve affirmative votes must be given for a presentment or indictment.

A betrayal of the secrets of your proceedings—and they are all secret—is a violation of your oath and will subject the offender to punishment for contempt.

You should first consider the cases of those who are confined in jail, then of those who are recognized or held under bond to appear and then all other cases. It is the duty of each one of you to disclose all breaches of the law known to you, to your fellows, that a proper investigation may be had.

In some localities there is still complaint about violations of the liquor law, by sales upon Sunday and to minors. These are important cases, if the evidence shows they exist, and should be given careful attention. It is often difficult to get proof from unwilling witnesses, but those of you who happen to be from the localities complained about can be of great assistance in such cases by the use of your knowledge of places and witnesses. Complaint has been made of a practice growing up in those parts of the county where prohibition of the liquor traffic obtains. It is that of shipping by express C. O. D packages of four or more quarts of whiskey to one person, whether he has ordered it or not. He then collects from three or four others a proportionate amount of the cost and takes out the package and divides the contents. This is a violation of the prohibitory laws and deserves careful investigation. It may be that the recipient of the liquor can be punished for selling without license. At any rate your investigations may lead to an amendment of the law so as to reach such cases.

You can compel witnesses to answer all proper questions, and the State puts its whole power behind you to enforce your rights. Absolute fearlessness of consequences should be your attitude.

There are some Statutes which are required to be laid before you at each term. I will leave their further explanation to the State's Attorney. They are: Art. 27, Sec 3 of Public General Laws on Abortion; Art. 27, Sec. 47, on Defaulters; Art. 39, Sec. 90, on Fishing out of season, and the Act of 1902, ch. 124, as to the Mining Regulations. I also direct your atttention to Sec. 10 of ch. 294 of the Acts of 1906 which makes it a misdemeanor to carelessly, negligently, wilfully or maliciously to set on fire any wood, bush, grass, grain or stubble on land not the property of the person so doing. This is a very salutary provision intended to protect our rapidly disappearing forests and other property and violaters of it should be dealt with promptly and thoroughly.

In dismissing you to your room the Court desires to say that the personnel and character of your members justifies the expectation of a short, painstaking, thorough and conscientious session.

The several dockets were called and motions made and judnments entered in uncontested cases. The original docket contains 42 cases, the appeal docket numbers 16 and the trial calendar has 72 cases of all sorts, sizes and kinds with which the court and bar will wrestle for some time to come.

APPEAL DOCKET.

No. 1. J. W. Beckman and Bro. vs. John F. Nydegger; appeal from Justice Gonder, where there was a judgment in favor of Nydegger for $71.24. Tried before the Court and held sub curia. Hamill and Semmes—Peddicord.

No. 2. J. W. Beckman & Bro. vs. William D. Nydegger; appeal from Justice Gonder, where there was a judgment in favor of Nydegger for $71.24. Tried before the Court and held sub curia. Hamill and Semmes—Peddicord.

No. 3. Donald Simpson vs. Arch. Casteel. Put at the end of the trial docket on motion of the appellee. Thayer and Renninger—Hamlll.

No. 4. Elvira Holliday vs. H. J. Wintermuth; appeal from Justice Leon Hardie; motion by appellee to quash proceedings; motion heard and held sub curia.

No. 5. Marion C. Hoye, assignee of John Shartzer, vs. The Garrett County Telephone Company. This was a suit on an account for $96.20 claimed by John Shartzer for services rendered to the Maryland, West Virginia & Pennsylvania Telephone Company before the said company sold out to the Garrett County Telephone Company. The testimony showed that the old company denied any indebtedness to Shartzer and the present company denied that it had ever assumed the payment of the claim or promised to pay it. Tried before the Court and held sub curia. This was an appeal from Justice Teats, who decided in favor of the Garrett Telephone Company. S. F. Hamill and Semmes—Peddicord.

No. 6. Cora V. Savage vs. Swift & Co.; entered settled.

No. 7. Frank W. Wildeson vs. Mahlon Glotfelty; appeal dismissed by order of appellant's attorney. Hamill—Renninger & Offutt.

No. 8. Stuart F. Hamill, Trustee, vs. A. E. Bosely; appeal from Justice Teats, who rendered a judgment for the defendant, Bosely. The appellant asked for a continuance on account of absent witness. Case continued at cost of appellant. Hamill and Semmes—Peddicord.

No. 9. George H. Mitchell vs. L. T. Friend; appeal from Justice Hoye; action for damages for breach of contract to furnish lumber; judgment below in favor of Friend; tried before the Court and held sub curia. Whitworth—Peddicord.

B. & O. Men Must Keep Sober.

That the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company intend to get better service and prevent accidents seems to be determined upon as 43 men have been discharged from the service on the Connellsville divison of the road since last pay day. The company states that they will not tolerate having a man who uses intoxicants to run on the road, thus preventing the loss of life and property. The callers have been warned that they are not to ask a man to report for duty if he is found in a saloon or if he is under the influence of liquor. The company is under the impression that many of the recent wrecks and disasters have been caused by the inebriety of the men while under the influence of drink.

The Slums of a Graet City.

On Tuesday evening June 18, at eight o'clock Rev. C. F. Floto, of St. Stephen's Lutheran church, Cumberland, will deliver a lecture in St. Mark's Lutheran church in Oakland entitled "The Slums of a Great City." The lecture will be illustrated with stereopticon veiws and number of sacred songs. All are invited to be present at the lecture.

DECORATION DAY WAS OBSERVED IN OAKLAND.

Old Soldiers and Others Partfcipated In the Exercises of the Occasion.

Decoration Day was observed as usual in Oakland on last Thursday when the old soldiers, members of the Knights of Pythias, school children and citizens generally repaired to the cemeteries and strewed flowers upon the graves of their departed comrades, friends and relatives.

Crook Post, Grand Army of the Republic, under whose direction the occasion was observed, assembled at Post Headquarters, and at 10.30, under command of Col. A. G. Sturgiss, Commander of the Post, took up the line of of march for the cemetery, followed by the school children, under the direction of Dr. Button, bearing flowers, and the Knights of Pythias, commanded by Dr. H. W. McComas and Capt. R. C. Townshend, brought up the rear.

On arriving at the cemetery details of old soldiers and Knights strewed flowers on the graves of their sleeping comrades, after which the ritual service was used. Rev. Marques officiated as chaplain.

Rural Route to be Established.

The Postoffice Department, upon petition from the residents of District No. 2 who are directly interested, has ordered established on June 17th, a rural route from Friendsville postoffice to cover that portion of the district embracing Blooming Rose, Auman and White Rock, returning to Friendsville by another route, and covering a distance of nineteen miles. Postmaster Frantz at Friendsville has on hand for distribution to those who contemplate entering the examination for carrier on this route a number of blanks which the applicants must fill out and forward to the department before the examination can be held and the route established. So far but one applicant has filed the necessary papers and Mr. Frantz has been advised by the department that unless other applications are made for the examination the route will be abandoned.

Lost a Valuable Animal.

Thomas Martin, Jr., sustained a loss Tuesday morning which has made him disconsolate ever since. His blooded percheron stallion, for which he was offered $1000 but a few weeks ago, died after a few hours illness notwithstanding every effort to save its life. Since last August Mr. Martin has lost three valuable horses from diseases and has had two badly crippled, which is truly a bad streak of luck.

CHILD BURNED TO DEATH.

Four-Year Old Infant Succumbed to Injuries Sustained from Falling in Fire.

A four year old child of Mr. and Mrs. Roderick, who reside on Major J. M. Burns' farm east of Mountain Lake Park, died on Saturday last from the effectsof injuries sustained by it a day or two previous when it fell into an open grate fire at the home of its parents.

The child was frightfully burned and suffered intensely until relieved by death.

Decoration Day at Deer Park.

The people of Deer Park on each recurring Decoration Day make an effort to outdo all previous efforts, and this year they certainly surpassed all previous occasions. The committee did its very best. Only one thing prevented a full fruition, and that was the day was not long enough to accomplish all the committee planned.

The chairman of the day was Mr. William D. Hoye. Mr. Hoye served in the Confederate army, but he is broad and liberal in his views, and applauded the sentiments uttered by the speakers for the Union side.

The Deer Park Cornet band aided the committee by furnishing sweet music, well rendered. Miss Florence Thrasher presided at the organ and with an excellent quartet of young ladies, gave "The Star Spangled Banner" and "Dixie," both of which were given with spirit and life. One of the Union veterans suggested that all arise and join in the chorus of "Dixie," and it was done with a will.

The following Union veterans were present on the platform: J. L. Wheeler, Sebastian Hinebaugh, Charles E. Jacks, J. R. Harshberger, J. F. Frantz, J. W. Laughlin, W. L. Shaffer, Geo. Marley, M. V. Flanigan, James P. Wright, G. W. Haulenbeek, Charles H. Sisk and W. D. Hoye, the two latter ex-Confederates.

The popular Methodist clergyman, Rev. E. J. Westfall, J. F. Frantz, C. E. Jacks and G. W. Haulenbeek made addresses.

At the cemetery, the orator of the day was the well known Baptist minister, Rev. C. W. Hudson.

The speaking, save that at the cemetery, was delivered from a beautifully decorated platform on the village green under the very few grand old oaks that still remain.

Many a woman goes out shopping dressed in silk and enveloped in perfume whose hard-working husband hasn't had a new suit of clothes or a decent meal in five years. Yes, and many a loafer stands on the street with a stinking pipe in his face, his tank full of "booze" and his mouth full of profanity, whose hard-working wife hasn't had a new dress or a kind word since she was married.

GARLANDS FOR SOLDIERS GRAVES

Memorial Day was generally observed throughout the country with appropriate exercises and flowers were placed upon the graves of the Union dead by their surviving brethern. It is a beautiful custom to thus remember those brave men who in the hour of their country's need did their duty as they saw it and laid down their lives in supporting the Union. In this day all are agreed that the preservation of the Union was worth all it cost in human blood and treasure but there is a growing liberality of thought toward those who fought on the Confederate side, for they too fought for what they believed in and in many thousands of cases out of loyalty to their State government after it had seceded. Devotion to duty, personal honor and herosim is the common heritage of Americans and was richly exemplified in the war between the States.

WANT TO BE U. S. SENATOR.

Hon. Joshua Frederick Cocky Talbott, the Baltimore county boss, is not the only Democrat turning longing eyes upon the senatorial toga when it shall fall from the shoulders of the venerable Senator Whyte. Hon. Joshua W. Miles announces his candidacy for the high station, and Ex-Governor Brown, while not avowedly a candidate, admits that he would like to go to the Senate.

Of the three Mr. Miles is undoubtedly best fitted to represent the State in the Upper House of Congress, the only objection to him, from a Republican standpoint, being that he is a rockribbed Democrat of so pronounced a type that it would take something more heretical and dangerous than the free silver craze to induce him to desist from active and vigorous support of his party.

All the gentlemen named seem to take it for granted that the next legislature will contain a sufficent number of Democratic members to insure the election of a Democrat as Senator Whyte's successor. In that, however, they may be mistaken and, if so, it will be decidedly to the advantage of the people of Maryland, and of the whole country, by contributing to the maintenance of the Republican majority in the Senate.

LOOKING BACKWARD.

The prevailing talk about late frosts and damaged crops was brought up to an interesting point on the floor of change yesterday though, the recalling by James A. Loudon, one of the oldest active grain merchants in the city, of the of the destructive frost which visited this country on May 17, 1859, just forty-eight years ago yesterday.

"There are few who recall that frost," he said, "but I have a very distinct recollection of it. That season, or spring like the present one, had crops and produce coaxed out early with mild, warm weather. Then came a sudden turn to cold, which resulted in the blighting frost of 48 years ago to-day. From the Mississippi river east, and you must remember there was nothing West at that time to amount to anything, crops were blighted. Prices jumped with leaps and bounds, and flour was shipped from Philadelphia to Pittsburg and from New York to Buffalo. Farmers, thinking that their crops had been ruined, went into the market and bought flour. I remember having an order for 200 barrels of flour, which I sold at a profit of $1.50 a barrel. After the excitement had died down there came a period of excellent growing weather and crops were resown."

The frost of May 17 was not the last for that season. On June 5 there was a heavy frost, and the river column of the Enquirer referred to it as follows:

"The decks of steamers were ornamented with this white mantle, which left the impression that even the most vigorous fruit must have been destroyed."

The editorial column of June 7 said: "The severe cold weather which was experenced in this vicinity on Saturday and Sunday, June 5 and 6, and which created a necessary for fire and great coats, has, as we feared, done much damage to the crop. We hear disastrous accounts of it from Cleveland, Zanesville and other places where the fruit was badly injured and the young corn destroyed."

By June 11 word had reached this city from Pittsburg of great damage done in that vicinity, and the Enquirer of that date carried the following extract from the Pittsburg Dispatch: "Fruit is seriously damaged by heavy frost on Sunday night. An extensive grower of grapes in this vicinity estimates his loss at $3,000. Another, residing near East Liberty says his apples and peaches are mainly, if not completely, ruined. The apples were frozen at the stems and dropped off by thousands when touched by the sun. On the south side of the river the gentleman describes the country as having the appearance of a land scorched by fire, so severe was the frost."

This wave of cold seems to have crossed the mountains and extended to the Atlantic Coast. An editorial in the Enquirer of Sunday, June 12, says: "We have accounts from Philadelphia and its vicinity of another severe frost which was experienced on the night of June 10 doing much damage to fruits and crops. Before these late disastrous frosts there was every indication of the most abundant harvest the country has seen for for years. The damage they have done is incalculable."

The same day appeared a clipping from the Advertiser, of Rochester, N. Y., which after reciting the heavy frost and general damage, described some of the efforts which had been made to protect flowers and tender plants. It said: "The paper and cloths with which the plants were covered took the dew, froze solid, and become sheets of ice around the tender plants."

The same day the weather report said that the day before "was so cold that over-coats had to be worn."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

SIX COWS KILLED MONDAY.

Fatal Day For Live Stock Ruminating Along B. & O. Tracks at Swanton.

Six cows, owned by three individuals at Swanton, this county, were killed on the tracks of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company near Swanton Monday of this week.

Two of the animals were owned by Mr. John O'Brien and were killed by a freight train early in the day. Train No. 55, due at Swanton about three o'clock in the afternoon, killed four other cows, three of them being owned by Mr. Charles M. Miller and one by Mr. Wade Lohr.

In every case the cows were blooded stock and were quite valuable.

When Butte Was A Barren Desert.

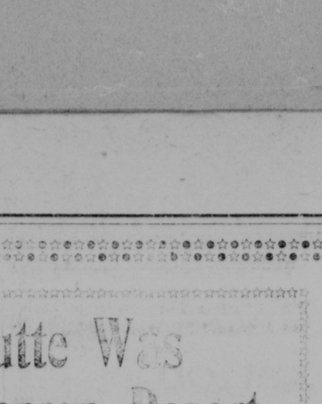
For five weeks last winter the city of Butte, Mont., was a barren desert. It was the driest place on earth. The water supply was all right, but owing to a strike all the newspapers were suspended.

Butte's experience proved that in this day and age the local newspaper is a public necessity. Nobody knew what was happening. False rumors spread like bad butter. Fake stories about citizens circulated by word of mouth until several duels almost resulted. There were no newspapers to tell the truth about things.

Business suffered worst of all. Merchants tried handbills, which didn't fill the bill. They worked the billboard overtime, but only bored the public. The people cried for newspapers as babies cry for— (See ad.)



For once in the history of the world it was demonstrated beyond peradventure that a town without a live newspaper is a dead one. Stores could not do business without properly advertising their wares, and they could not advertise properly without newspaper space.

Butte merchants are now advertising to make up for lost time. Business men who didn't think much of advertising before have learned its value and are using newspaper space.

The experience of Butte carries a lesson for every other town—this one, for instance:

ADVERTISING PAYS ITS OWN WAY.

SLOPPY WEATHER.

Prognosticator Smith Promises Plenty of Moisture for June.

June is likely to continue wet, with an increase in the vigor of rainfall in a number of sections of the country. However, this order of rainfall will change after the end of the solstice periods. Local droughts will follow in a great number of sections, both in the west and south, and in parts favored with moisture too much is likely to prevail for agricultural purpose to secure all the crops.

As a general characteristic of the solstice period of the clouds are more heavily charged with electricity. Winds of much force will prevail in some localities and local downpours, and floods confined to limited districts. The temperatue will be fluctuating till after the middle of the month—hot and cold waves will play on the meteorology through most of the month.

The first storm period of June will be central on or touching the 4th. A hot wave will denote the oncoming period of disturbance, which will discharge rain, hail, and also high winds will prevail. Clearing and cooler weather will follow about the 5th.

On or about the 9th more rain will develop, which is not likely to be general, however The portions touched by it will have vigorous showers and the clouds heavily charged with electricity.

The 13th or 14th will pass into a very hot wave, which will prove the most vigorous wave of the month, with rain, hail, wind and much electric display. The meteorology will clear about the 17th, bringing bracing and a cleared meteorology.

About the 21st or 22d a local rain wave will develop of much vigor, causing local floods, storms of wind, and much thunder and lightning.

The last storm period of the month will appear about the 27th.

DRIVING CAT OUT OF ATTIC

Oscar Neat Caused Powder Explosion Which May be Fatal to Him.

Oscar Neat, aged 17 years, a son of Noah Neat, a miner, living in Garrett county, about a mile and a half from Barton, was probably fatally burned by the explosion of a can of powder at his home Friday evening at 7 o'clock. Young Neat, who is employed at the Caledonia stables, upon returning home from work discovered a cat in the attic of his home. He lit a match in an endeavor to find the animal to chase it out and in some manner the lighted match ignited powder that had been spilled on the floor, which acting as a fuse to the powder can nearby exploding it, setting fire to the house and burning it to the ground with all its contents. Young Neat's injuries are very serious and he was taken to the Western Maryland Hospital Saturday morning. He is the second son of a large family of children, but the other children escaped injury. Mr. Neat, sr., was in Lonaconing at the time of the accident and did not arrive home until several hours after the explosion. The young man was taken to the home of George Langham where his injuries were dressed. The remainder of the homeless family are being cared for at the home of Mr. Wm. Russell.

THE DEATH RECORD.

ALVIN BITTINGER.

On Friday, May 24, 1907, at Bare Hill, Alvin, son of Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Bittinger, aged one year, three months and thirteen days. The deceased, whose loss will be deeply felt and mourned by the members of the household, was laid to rest in the Lutheran cemetery at Bittinger.

Oh! little Alvin's gone,
The darling laid away
To rest in peace till the bright
Morn of Eternal Day.

The farewell word is said,
The farewell kiss is given;
His body lies among the dead,
His soul at rest in Heaven.

Oh! Father, give us grace
To bear the chast'ning rod;
Help us to meet the smiling face
Of an indulgent God.

Help us to trust in Thee,
When darkness intervenes,
And may we pass on fearlessly
Through all life's darkest scenes.

MRS. JOHN BAKER.

Mrs. John Baker, aged eighty-three years, died on Sunday at the home of her son Henry Baker, near Johnson's, on the National Road, in District No. 9, and was buried at the Hostetler graveyard in Somerset county, Pa., on Tuesday. Mrs. Baker was twice married her first husband being named McIntyre. Two children resulted from this union. Her second husband, John Baker, died many years ago, leaving four sons, Messrs. Philip, Henry, Jacob and Simon Baker, all of whom are upright, progessive citizens of District No. 9.

BITTINGER.

A very pleasant Memorial Day celebration was held in this village on Thursday of last week. There were twelve servivors of the Civil War on the ground and took part in the exercises. The services began with a regular army bean soup dinner for the comrades at 1 o'clock, after which "the old boys" marched in regular military style to the village cemetery where with loving hands they scattered flowers on the graves of departed comrades. They then marched to the church nearby and were addressed in a masterly way by Attorney Hendrickson, of Cumberland. There were a large number of people present and the remainder of the day was spent in a social picnic.

Jacob Lohr, who left this section more than two years ago and located in St. George, Ga., and has been an inmate of the National Soldiers' Home in Tennessee for some time, surprised his friends here last week by his sudden return. Mr Lohr will visit here a month or two before returning to the home.

Thomas Hendershot and family moved to this village this week.

Perry Bowser returned last Sunday from California where he had been visiting for five weeks and he is loud in his praises of the Pacific slope.

J. W. Thomas, of Deer Park, was in this section last Monday and purchased some real estate.

T. J. Lohr was in Oakland on business early this week.

Dr. Webster Ravenscroft, of Oakland, was looking after some timber tracts near here last week.

Clarence Brenneman went over to Springs, Pa., last Monday where he will be employed as a teamster.

Messrs. John H. and James Stark, of the Bittinger district, were in Oakland on court business this week, both gentleman making this office business calls.

Mr. Tnomas Pollock, Mrs. Walton and daughter Miss Annie Walton, of Philadelphia, are here visiting Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Pollock at their home on Second street.

Mr. G. A. Fraley, assistant cashier of the Garrett National Bank of Oakland, has been confined to his home during the past week with an acute attack of inflammatory rheumatism.

Mr. A. R. Roderick, foreman for Mr. W. A. Liller, who has the contract for erecting the new court house in Oakland arrived here yesterday morning and will begin the preliminary work as soon as the weather conditions permit.

Ex-County Commissianer Taylor Friend, of near Friendsvilie, was in Oakland a day or two this week attending court as a witness in a land case. Mr. Friend returned to his home yesterday afternoon.

Rev. J. A. McClelland, the new pastor of Grafton's Presbyterian Church, was formally installed as such on Tuesday night, with ceremonies of an appropriate and impressive character.—Grafton Leader.

Attorney Fred T. Martin spent yesterday at Oakland, the guest of his family, who are summering there. The Martin family have one of the most beautiful homes in that city of architectural correctness.—Grafton Republican.

The Board of County Commissioners in session Monday and Tuesday adjourned yesterday morning after transacting routine business and asking for bids for the erection of a number of bridges, advertisements for which appear in this paper today.

Among the representative citizens of District No. 2 who were in Oakland this week on court business and otherwise were Messas. Samuel Falkner, Jacob S. Myers, J. G. Kolb, Cornelius W. Friend, P. S. Friend, Clarence V. Guard and R. M. Holman, all of whom have numerous friends and acquaintance in Oaklaud who were pleased to meet them.

The men and women who try to make their home the most interesting spot on earth for each other, and for their friends and those who are near and dear to them, have but occasional use for the club. It is to them, like the theatre, a pleasant place to enter now and then but not a spot to dwell in.

We will offer a little free advice to the young men and young ladies who read this paper. Never marry until you are certain that single life is a failure and under no circumstances marry until you find some one that will have you. Be sure you are right, then go ahead. Boys, remember that a girl rigged out in ribbons and paint may look good enough to eat; but that smile however, may be made to order and come off with her best cloths.

If you don't just like everything you see in your home paper, go around the streets and howl. The editor is never supposed to make a mistake and of course cannot do so. Other people can, but the editor is ubiquitous, omniscient, omnipotent, "omniverous." If you can't see a good point, don't fail to see a bad one. If a thousand pleasant things are said of people, hunt for something unpleasant. If you don't find it, howl some more; if you do, howl anyway. Never mind your own business; watch for something to find fault with in some other man's business, this will make you great.

The old saying that an "idle brain is the devil's work shop and idle hands his tools." Oh, how true this saying is. It is to this shop that the tattler goes for material wherewith to blight some happy home or attempt to ruin the character and reputation of their fellowman by falsifying his good name, and forever destroying his bright prospects for the future. You cannot realize how low down and comtemptible a village tattler is, until you have seen some of the results of their tattlers tales.

Sunday was one of the coldest and most disagreeable days of the present peculiar season. Although the calendar marked the date as the second of June, when all should be warm and brightness overcoats added to the comfort of pedestrians, and it may be gambled on that there were more people remained indoors than went out. Even "the oldest inhabitants" have quit trying to compare this season, for they cannot remember a comparison. It is predicted however, that July, August and September will be unusally warm months, so we may yet remember with feelings of appreciation that we wore overcoats the second day of June.

The Standard Oil Company, where pipe line pass throught the State of Pennsylvania a few feet north of the Maryland line, has connected up its eight-inch pipes at the top of Savage Mountain, near Finzel, the work having been completed a few days ago. This makes the greatest trunk line of pipes in the world, carrying fifty thousand barrels of oil every day to eastern cities. These pipes carry oil from Kansas, West Virginia and Pennsylvania, amounting to the aggregate to over $18,000,000 worth annually. A new pumping station for this line is being built near Finzel.

SUNNYSIDE.

The afternoon picnic and base ball at this place last Thursday was played with good success. The contesting sides were Oakland and Sunnysiae. The game began at 2:30 p. m. During the game the Oak land boys acted very kind and were jovial to the home club. We are not imformed how many innings and scores were made, but we do know that Sunnyside was the winning club.

Miss Cara Dodge called on the Misses Buncutter one day last week.

Andrew Rolf took supper with Joshua Brenninger last Wednesday.

ROBBERY SATURDAY NIGHT.

Store of Messrs. Lantz Brothers Broken Into and $50 Worth of Goods Taken.

Sometime between midmight Saturday and daylight Sunday morning the store of Messrs. Lantz Brothers, located in the Little building corner Third and Oak streets, was entered by burglars and goods to the amount of $50 or more stolen.

Entrance to the store was effected through the front door which was forced by a crowbar stolen from the tool house of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. Adjoining the Lantz store is located the meat store of W. D. Dixon, which was also entered by the burglars through a communicating door connecting the two rooms. Nothing from the latter store, however, was stolen.

The goods taken from the Lantz store consisted of shoes, jewelry, neckwear, etc. A number of cartons which contained the stolen shoes were found along the railroad track a short distance east of Oakland, and it is the supposition that the robbery was committed by a band of four tramps who spent the day at the pumping station of the railroad at the foot of Fourth street.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The weather continues unsettled, yet our summer visitors continue to come.

Cottages are being rented every day but there are still a number not yet taken.

Dr. B. Frank Laughlin and Miss Sue Rebecca Browning were married at the residence of the bride's parents, Blaine, W. Va., Wednesday. After a tour of ten days or two weeks they will be at home in Mountain Lake Park.

Preaching in the Hall of Philosophy Sunday evening at 8 o'clock by Rev. Dr. W. W. Davis. Everybody invited.

The repairs to the M. E. church will be completed and the regular services resumed Sunday, June 16th.

Since our last report the following cottages have been rented for the summer: The Waugh cottage and the Custer cottage, on D street, the Jarboe cottage on Baltimore avenue and the Spitzer cottage on I street. The latter cottage is occupied by Mr. E. W. Williams and family, of Clarksburg.

Mrs. P. T. Garthright has been quite ill for some time.

A little son of Rev. and Mrs. Lee is seriously ill at the residence of Mr. A. R. Sperry.

A little son of Mr. and Mrs. Roderick, residing on the Major Burns farm near the Park, was fatally burned a few days ago and died in a few hours thereafter.

Major J. M. Burns was among our visitors this week. The Major and family will occupy their cottage here the latter part of this month.

Mrs. Parran Deakins (nee Mamie Deffinbaugh) sold her summer cottage here to Rev. Mr. Preston. Mr. C. W. Hopkins negotiated the sale.

Mrs. Gilbert, who spent the winter with her daughter in Parkersburg, is in her cottage on G street.

Captain Maulsby is now occupying his cottage in Cosy Row.

Mrs. Cady, of Clarksburg, W. Va., will have the management of Queenwood Hotel this season.

The electric light plant was started up last Saturday, under the management of Mr. Crandell, of Baltimore, and Jno. D. Hayden, of the Park.

FIKE.

The weather during the past week here has been cool with the exception of one or two days.

The corn is not coming up as yet and a number of farmers are afraid that it will not come up at all.

The oats are growing slowly but unless we have more good weather, the crops will be small throughout.

Mr. Jasper Fike is still taking pictures and is making good success.

Mr. John S. Fike and wife were at the Barnthouse cemetery one day last week beautifying the graves of their friends and relatives.

It is evident that Mr. L. K. Fike has succeeded in getting a buddy to make trips to Fearer, Md., for you can hear L. K. talk to Jasper Fike by telephone and make arrangements to travel in company. I would say L. K. Fike should go to Fearer June 8, 1907. I tell him this for I heard that he would like to know when to go.

Mr. Owen Evans rides around at present with a fatherly smile, for a baby boy arrived at their home on May 28th.

The Bowser Bros. and John R. Fike have finished cutting timber on the Henry Lee property.

Mr. A. T. Fike is ill at this writing.

George W. Bowser is also sick at present. We hope that both will soon be well.

The teachers of this place are patiently awaiting the examination which they will likely attend at Accident on the 20th inst.

Mr. Joshua Burgess was seen one day last week at Mr. John Hileman saw mill on business.

Mr. George E. Wass passed through here last week selling fertilizer for buckwheat.

There are a large number of young colts in this section being bred from the $3000 Percheon horse, owned by the Markleysburg Horse Co., and this fall if any one would want to purchase a good young colt he could surely find one to suit him around here.

Married.

FRANKLIN—MITCHELL—One of the very prettiest weddings ever solemnized in Oakland took place at St. Paul's M. E. church on Tuesday evening, June 4th, at eight o'clock, when Miss Mary Adeline Mitchell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John T. Mitchell, of Oakland, became the bride of Mr. Thomas Franklin, of Roanoke, Va. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Henry Hamill, of Winchester, uncle of the bride, in presence of a very large number of invited guests, admission to the church being obtained by cards. The bride, attired in a magnificent robe of princess lace over white taffeta, with a flowing vail, and carrying a bonquet of bride's roses and lillies of the valley, entered the church on the arm of her father, being attended by her sister Miss Rose Mitchell, as maid of honor. At the chancel rail of the church the bride was met by the groom. The maid of honor was gowned in pink silk and carried pink roses, while the bridesmaids, Misses Bess Offutt, Grace Jones, Joe Robinson and Annie Grant, were attired very beautifully in gowns of white organdie and carried pink carnations. Master John Mitchell, brother of the bride, was ring bearer. Mr. John Woodruff, of Roanoke, Va., was the groom's best man and the ushers were Harry W. McComas, Stuart and Byrne Hamill, and Bowie Johnson. Miss Lottie Loar, as organist of the church, played the wedding march from Lohengrin. After the church ceremony a reception was held at the home of the bride at which delightful refreshments were served, the couple leaving on a later train for a tour of the South. The will reside in Roanoke, where the groom holds a very lucrative position with one of the railroad lines entering that city. The bride has a large circle of friends in Oakland whose good wishes follow her.

SOMMERVILLE — STICKLEY — A few days ago the interesting information leaked out that Miss Emily Stickley, who for several years past has made her home in Oakland with her aunt, Miss Nell Turley, had been married early last March to Mr. Sidney H. Sommerville, a leading attorney practicing at the Taylor county (W. Va.) bar, the wedding having been kept a secret by the parties and their relatives up to this time. The many friends of both parties will be delighted to learn of the wedding and will be delighted to extend their congratulations. Speaking of the event the Grafton Sentinel of Tuesday says: "Miss Stickley, who is prominent in social circles in her home city is well known in Grafton having visited here frequently in years passed and the people of Grafton will be glad to welcome her. At the present time she is reported to be lying seriously ill at her home, a fact to be greatly regretted and her husband has gone to Oakland to be at her bedside during her illness. The friends of the couple here and elsewhere will hope that she will soon recover her former health. The news of the wedding of Mr. Sommerville and Miss Stickley came as a great surprise to their many friends here as such a thing was not even thought of. It is expected that as soon as Mrs. Sommerville recover from her present sickness that they will come here and make their home in the future."

BOYER—ANDERSON—At the Schley Hotel, by Rev. E. Manges, on Saturbay, June 1st, Miss Jeanette Anderson and Mr. Stanley Elmer Boyer, both of Fairmomt, West. Va., were joined in the holy bonds of wedlock. The groom is a son of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Boyer, and is well known in Oakland. The bridal party was accompanied to Oakland by the groom's sister, Miss Mary Boyer, and returned to Fairmont Monday morning, where they will reside.

Proposals for Bridges.

Notice is hereby given that the County Commissioners of Garrett county, Maryland, will receive sealed proposals until at 2 o'clock p. m., at their office in the town of Oakland, Maryland, for the building of a low truss wrought iron bridge, the superstructure to consist of one span of 40 feet long and 12 feet wide with stone or concrete abutments and to be built according to the plans and specifications now on file. Said bridge is to be built over Laurel Run, 1⅛ miles from Dobbin, in Election District No. 8. The bids submitted shall be for the superstructure separate from the stone or concrete work and vice versa.

At the same time and place sealed proposals for the building of a low truss wrought iron bridge over North Fork of Castleman, 2 miles west from Jennings, in Election District No. 3, said bridge to be 40 feet long and 12 feet wide with stone abutments. The bids submitted shall be for the superstructure and substructure separate, as per plans on file.

Also, sealed proposals will be received at the same time and place for the building of a low truss wrought iron bridge over Bear Creek, 1⅛ miles east of Friendsville, in Election District No. 2. Said bridge to be one span 40 feet long and 12 feet wide with stone abutments. The bids for iron are to be separate from stone work. See plans on file.

The County Commissioners reserve the right to reject any or all bids.

Cupid and the Committee.

By CARROLL GORDON.

Copyright, 1907, by P. C. Eastment.

"Do you draw up resolutions and things?" asked Kate Masters eagerly.

"No," scorned Matie. "You send a committee to the boss and tell him we won't work any more."

"I'd rather write," declared Grace Kelso. "I'd be scared to death to go in there and talk to him."

"Writing isn't half so good," declared Matie. "You just tell him what the matter is and that we'll go on strike if Bromley isn't dismissed, and that's all there is to it."

"All," repeated Kate. "I should think it would be enough. The idea of going right in to Mr. Temple and telling him that we're not going to work any more unless Bromley is sacked. I'd be so scared I couldn't speak."

"I'm not afraid," said Matie disdainfully.

"I vote that we make Matie Lester a committee all by herself," suggested Grace, and the motion was unanimously carried without the formality of a seconding.

"No, you don't," cried Matie. "I'll do the talking, but we want a lot of girls for the committee. It has a good effect."

In the end a committee of five was appointed, and it was agreed that the noon hour the next day would be the proper time for making the demand. Matie lay awake half the night thinking what she should say, and her argument was continued in her dreams.

The room was all excitement the next morning, and as the noon hour approached the excitement grew more intense. Every girl in the room left her lunch untouched to accompany the committee on its errand of protest and left them only at the beginning of the short hall at the end of which was Edward Temple's office.

The departure of the escort seemed to have a bad effect on the others, for, as Matie rapped on the door and a deep voice responded, the other four girls right about faced as by common impulse and fled down the passageway.

For a moment Matie watched them, dismayed. Then with a firm hand she turned the knob and entered the room. In place of the gray haired man she expected to find the room was tenanted only by an alert young fellow, who looked up expectantly as she approached.

"I BEG YOUR PARDON," SHE STAMMERED.

"I beg your pardon," she stammered. "I thought that this was Mr. Temple's room."

"So it is," he responded briskly, "and this is Mr. Temple. Only it happens that my father did not come down this morning. Anything I can do for you? I am Frank Temple."

"I don't know that you'll do," she said dubiously. "You see, I'm a strike—I mean a strike committee," she corrected.

"A single committee is rather unusual," he smiled. "Do I understand that you represent the factory?"

"The finishing room," she explained. "There were five of us, but the rest ran away."

"I see," he said gravely, though his eyes twinkled. "And may I ask the nature of the demands to be made?"

"It's that horrid Jim Bromley," she exclaimed. "We don't want more money or anything, but we want a new foreman. He's just as mean as can be. He wouldn't have Bess Bradley's machine fixed the other day, and when it broke down and hurt her hand he docked her for the time she was away. He's always fining us for every little thing, and he's that mean"—

Matie's pause spoke volumes, and her eyes added to the story. Temple grinned.

"I shall have to look into this," he said. "Take a chair, please." He left her to herself, but presently he came back with another young man as clean cut as himself.

"Mr. Everett will look into the matter," said Temple. "Just tell him about the mean Mr. Bromley."

"Now you're laughing at me," said Matie indignantly.

"Far from it," he denied. "Grievance committees should be treated most seriously."

"And this is serious," she declared, turning to Everett. Her sense of wrong sustained gave her eloquence, and her eyes snapped as she recited a long tale of Bromley's wrongs. Everett listened attentively, though at times he and Temple exchanged sympathetic glances as some quaint turn of speech caught their sense of humor.

"This is a matter that most certainly should be looked into," he said. "I do not believe in fines except as a last resort. Suppose you help us get at the bottom of the trouble."

"I'm telling you all about it now," she cried.

"I know," he agreed, "but to get Bromley right we shall have to wait. Now, if you will explain to the others that the matter will be properly settled if they will go on as they have been doing for a week I think we can hand a very unpleasant surprise to the enterprising Mr. Bromley. It appears from the books that few fines have been turned in. On account of the number of employees the envelopes are made up several days ahead, and the foreman of each department takes out the fines. Now, on Saturday make a note of all the fines, bring the envelopes to me, and we will have the matter straightened out."

Matie looked him squarely in the eye. "Do you really mean that?" she demanded.

"Most certainly," he assured.

"Shake hands on it," she demanded. Everett blushed as his fingers closed over the smaller hand—and lingered there.

Matie went back to the room with a sense of importance. Word was passed along that it was all right and to meet on the corner after the factory closed. There was a babel of voices as the plot was unfolded, and when at last the impromptu meeting adjourned Everett was lingering there.

"I saw the crowd forming," he laughed as he fell into step beside Matie, "and I waited to hear the outcome."

She tucked her hand through the proffered arm, and together they went down the street.

The next night Everett was waiting again, and so on until Saturday, when at the noon hour the girls were paid off. There were the usual heavy fines marked on the envelopes, and Matie formed a line and marched off to the office. Bromley had already turned back to the cashier the fines he had collected, but a rapid computation showed that the envelopes and the statement to the cashier developed a discrepancy of more than $10. The foreman had been detained in the office on a pretext, and when he left the building it was in company with a blue coated official, and the girls lingered on the corner to hold a jubilee over the downfall of their enemy.

"Who's going to be cashier now?" demanded one of the celebrants. Matie grew red.

"I'm to be in charge for a little while," she said. "Mr. Everett arranged that last night."

"That's too bad," said one of the girls.

"Why, please?" demanded Matie hotly.

"We won't have any one to speak for us when we want to go on strike against you."

"That's so," laughed one of the others. "All the other girls on the committee ran away."

"I guess I shall not be in charge long enough for you to get sore on me," said Matie importantly. "I'm to be married in a month."

This was news indeed, and the girls crowded eagerly about her. For a moment she fought off their questioning, but at last she faced them defiantly.

"I'm going to be married to Mr. Everett, if you have to know," she said.

"That's what you get for being on the committee," said one of them enviously.

"Well," reminded Matie, "there's four of you that can't say you didn't have a chance, and I don't mind telling you that I'm glad you didn't take it. Jim Everett is worth interviewing the president himself for."

Dumas' "Camille."

Dumas' famous play "Camille" is a dramatized novel. The book is called "The Lady With the Camellias," and the author, Alexandre Dumas, Jr., based his central character on Marie Duplessis, a Parisian actress, to whose kindness and patronage he owed much of his early success. He stopped one day, through missing a train, at a common little inn at St. Germain, frequented by laborers and carters. The idea of the story struck him while there, and he began it, writing on a corner of the inn table. He remained there three weeks, at which time it was finished. The first publisher of the story gave the young author $240 for the privilege of printing two editions, aggregating 2,700 copies. When Dumas proposed a third edition he was told to go about his business, which he did, making an immense sum for himself and his next publisher.

Two Odd Blunders.

There stands in Westminster abbey, London, a splendid monument of Cromwell in riding attire. The spurs which adorn his high boots are upside down, showing that while the man who created the statue was an expert in this line he was totally unfamiliar with the art of riding. These reversed spurs are not always noticed by visitors, but those who know about them find them one of the most interesting features of the monument. One of the famous swords wielded by that warrior, the Black Prince, is to be seen in a window in the same building. It is a painted window on the landing leading from the floor of the palace to the committee rooms above. On the weapon held in the hands of the prince may be read an inscription in which the words "Prince of Whales" figure prominently.

BOWSER BUYS TULIP.

Thinks He Is Going to Get Flower to Beat Prize Carnation.

PLANS SPOILED BY CANINE.

Dog Digs Up Plant Costing $25 and Makes Off With It Before the Eyes of the Owner, Who Pursues Animal In Vain.

[Copyright, 1907, by M. M. Cunningham.]

Mrs. Bowser went shopping the other afternoon, and as she returned home at half past 4 she found Mr. Bowser with his coat off making a flower bed in the front yard. It had been talked over and agreed that there should be a flower bed in a certain spot, but it had been also understood that Mrs. Bowser was to make the bed and grow such flowers as she chose. She therefore looked to Mr. Bowser for an explanation, and he said:

"I hadn't a thought of doing this when I went away this morning, but something happened right after dinner that may be called the hand of Providence. You have heard of what is called the Lawson pink, haven't you?"

"I've read about it."

"Thomas W. Lawson of Boston paid $40,000 for a pink and named it after himself, and it is said that he made over a million dollars out of it. Orders came for his pinks from all over the world. If it hadn't been for a brindle cow breaking into his yard one night and gulping all the pinks down, he'd have made more money than John D. Rockefeller."

"Well, what has this to do with your getting home at this hour of the day and making a flower bed?" asked Mrs. Bowser.

Wanted to Sell Tulip.

"As I said, the hand of Providence seems to be in it. A man came into the office this morning and asked for Jones. I told him there was no Jones around there. He seemed very much put out, and I finally learned from him that he wanted to sell Jones a tulip—a tulip that will knock the Lawson pink colder 'n a wedge. The man is a florist and has been experimenting for the last ten years with tulips. He has finally struck it."

MAKING A FLOWER BED IN THE FRONT YARD.

"With a club?" was innocently asked.

"How many colors do you see in the ordinary tulip?" he queried as he dropped his voice to a whisper and looked all around to see if anybody was listening.

"Two or three."

"And what would you say to one showing seventeen—seventeen different colors, Mrs. Bowser, and all of them so bright and vivid as to arouse the beholder to the heights of enthusiasm and admiration? Lawson and his old pink can go hang. They are not in it. They are not within a hundred miles of being in it. In a month or six weeks from now Samuel Bowser and the Bowser tulip will be talked about on the streets of Constantinople on the one hand and Siberia on the other. There will be a crowd of a thousand people in front of our house all day long. There will be forty policemen on duty here. There will be from five to twenty reporters interviewing us day and night. I will be filling orders from the uttermost ends of the earth. Tomorrow I shall order 1,000 photographs and be ready for the papers. By thunder, Mrs. Bowser—by thunder, we have hit it at last!"

Paid $25 For It.

His earnestness and enthusiasm couldn't help but touch her a bit, but presently she asked in a business voice:

"And what did you pay for this wonderful tulip?"

"What do you think? He had seen and talked with Jones on a previous occasion. Jones had agreed to give him $500. As he had now lost track of Jones and as he wanted the money to pay off a chattel mortgage on his horse, I saw my opportunity. I laughed at him, I sneered at him—in brief, I bulldozed him into taking $25 for the tulip. There were tears in his eyes as he went out."

"Yes; tears of joy. I'd shed a few myself for that much money. Mr. Bowser, you've been worked again."

He Gets Vexed.

"Woman, don't talk to me that way! I am no child. I think I understand human nature as well as you do, and I'll take my dying oath that the man is all right. He offered to go before a notary and make oath that it was a seventeen colored tulip and that it was the only one in the known world. If I hadn't taken it, he'd have gone on to see Lawson and probably got $20,000 for it."

The bulb was wrapped up in tissue paper. Mrs. Bowser looked at it and saw that it had four or five green sprouts ready to do more growing, but that it didn't differ from the ordinary tulip bulb.

"I ought to have had that $25 to get me a dress with," she finally said as she returned the bulb.

"To get a dress with! Great heavens, you compare a dress to a tulip with seventeen different colors, to a tulip that will make our name famous in a month, to a tulip that may bring us in tens of thousands of dollars within a few weeks! Stop and think of the supreme selfishness of it. By John, I wouldn't have believed that such human nature existed! In your envy and jealousy and selfishness you would have the thing a failure, but it won't be. I have the bed prepared, and I will now set out the tulip. It will grow. It will flourish. It will throw out its seventeen different colors. You can go on."

Mrs. Bowser entered the house, and the bulb was placed in the middle of the bed. It was an hour to dinner, and during the interval Mr. Bowser sat down on the steps to watch and guard.

A dog came along and jumped the fence and would have pulled the bulb from the ground by one of the shoots had not the watcher yelled at him.

A hoodlum came along and looked over the gate and asked Mr. Bowser if he was going into turnip growing. The cold stare he received made his scalp tingle.

A tramp came along and recognized the bulb as a sugar beet and wanted to discuss the rise and fall of the vegetable, but he was ordered to move on in such tones that he was reminded of lunatics and mad dogs.

Watched the Plant.

During the dinner hour Mrs. Bowser asked no questions, and the tulip was not referred to. Acting under instructions from Mr. Bowser, the cook took frequent peeps from the basement windows to see that no one entered the yard. As he rose from the table he said to Mrs. Bowser:

"Madam, I shall pass the evening on the front steps. If you are planning to throw hot water on my tulip or otherwise destroy it, you will meet with disappointment."

"But why should I wish to destroy your tulip?" she protested.

"Why have you made twelve different attempts to assassinate me since we were married?"

It was an hour or more before darkness came. Mr. Bowser kept his eye on that tulip and thought of wealth and fame and pictured a rush of reporters to secure his photograph. When darkness settled down, Mrs. Bowser came to the door and asked him if he was going to sit up all night, but in reply he gave her a glare that made her shiver.

He was there when the bells struck 8. So was his tulip.

He was there at 9, and the tulip was nestling down in its earthy bed and preparing to grow.

At 10 o'clock Mrs. Bowser came to the door again and found him nodding. The boy on the opposite side of the street who was just getting ready to hurl a potato stayed his hand, and after standing for a moment she reentered the house and went to bed.

End of the Experiment.

Eleven o'clock came. Mr. Bowser was asleep and dreaming when a shadowy form stole up the street. It stopped at his gate and peered between the pickets. It made sure that the man on the steps slumbered, and then it leaped the fence and advanced upon the flower bed. The seventeen colored tulip was there and defenseless. That shadowy form was a dog, and he was after bones. With a gurgle in his throat he made a sudden spring, tore at the dirt for a second, and as Mr. Bowser awoke with a yell the canine seized the bulb in his mouth and leaped back into the street. The yell brought Mrs. Bowser to the window. She looked down to see Mr. Bowser roll down the steps and make off after the fleeing dog. There was no one else on the street. There were flickers from the electric lights; there were ghostly shadows dancing here and there. The spirits of departed dogs and tulips frolicked up and down. And as she looked the forms of Mr. Bowser and the pursued vanished in the darkness down the street, and the just and the unjust who had been momentarily disturbed turned over in their beds and slumbered again. ## A Business "Relaxation" Is Coming.

By J. J. HILL, President Great Northern Railway.

IT is said that the steel trade is not showing any signs of reaction. Very true. But the steel business of today is different from other kinds of business, and even different from the steel business of a few years ago. NEW USES for the finished steel product are coming to the front every day. The town merchant who used to be satisfied with a two or three story wooden structure now insists upon having at least a five story building of steel. Some man in nearly every town in the country who has made a little fortune wants to put up a steel building and carve his name on it. They build ships of steel now rather than wood, and railroad men who used to build wooden cars are building steel cars now. Hundreds of instances might be given to show the MULTIPLICITY OF USES to which the steel product is now put, all of which proves it is on a sounder footing than ever before.

ONCE A LUXURY, STEEL HAS NOW BECOME A NECESSITY.

But take some of the luxuries which are bought only in flush times. Here is where the reaction first sets in. In this department there is now a general slowing up. Go a step further. Six months ago railroad men could not talk with car builders. The latter were too busy to talk, and when they could talk they could not promise deliveries. Now, I am told, the CAR BUILDERS ARE SEEKING THE RAILROAD MEN. The latter, however, are shy.

It is the same in many of the big manufacturing lines. Excess orders piled up months ago will keep the plants going full swing well into the fall. But now there is a falling off in orders. Unless there is a change this means the big plants that have been running full blast will have to LET MEN GO. In that case it would not be surprising if we heard the rattle of a few empty dinner pails. There will be two jobs for three men instead of THREE JOBS FOR TWO MEN. Your skilled laborer who has been intoxicated with the flush of prosperity for so long won't like the new order of things. He will get tired looking for another job and go back to Mother Earth again and seek the STEADY LIVING which cultivation of the soil affords. Your day laborer who has been insisting on getting $2.50 or $3 a day will be satisfied to take 30 or 40 per cent less. Your banker who has been sitting back shaking his head and saying money is scarce will find that it has become a drug on the market. A presidential campaign will be at hand.

Now, I would call this a HEALTHY RELAXATION. It is far more healthy than the disastrous panic of ten years ago or even the reaction which preceded the last presidential election.

NOW, IT WILL PROBABLY BE MORE OR LESS A CONTROLLED REACTION WHERE PREVIOUS REACTIONS TOOK THE BIT IN THEIR TEETH AND RAN PELLMELL INTO PANICS. THE COUNTRY IS GROWING AND WILL CONTINUE TO GROW. RELAXATION WILL BE HEALTHFUL.

Railroads and the Public.

By MELVILLE E. INGALLS of Cincinnati, Transportation Authority.

IN the latter part of 1906 and up to the present there never was a great interest that was so weak, so abused AND SO HELPLESS as the railway interests. One would think from the speeches that are being made, from the publications, from the magazines and newspapers that the railway managers were men of ill repute, capable of almost every crime—FOES OF THE PUBLIC. Yet they are the men who have been the chief factors in building up the prosperity of the country. NO ONE dares to raise a voice in their defense.

THE MEN WHO HAVE RECEIVED FAVORS AND FREE TRANSPORTATION ARE THE LOUDEST IN PREACHING REFORMS AND REGULATION OF RAILWAYS.

By patience and time the legislation of congress and the states in reference to the railways must be HARMONIZED. It will not do to have forty-six states passing forty-six different acts. We must have legislation giving us authority to contract and agreements which can be ENFORCED. These agreements must be public and, in case of complaint, passed upon by the interstate commerce commission. We must have legislation providing that no new railways shall be built or NEW STOCK OR BONDS ISSUED, except with the approval of the interstate commerce commission.

I know this will cause a storm among some railway promoters, but they have got to admit and might as well make up their minds now that they are no longer a PRIVATE INDUSTRY, and he who is not prepared to manage his railway as a public institution IN ACCORDANCE WITH LAW should resign.

A Tax For Heiresses Who Marry Foreigners.

By PAUL MORTON, Ex-Secretary of the Navy of the United States.

ON the matter of the immense exportation of money from America to Europe by means of heiresses, I have often believed that SOME KIND OF TAX should be put upon it. Particularly have I for a long time thought that a tax of some kind should be placed on the incomes which American women carry to Europe AFTER THEIR MARRIAGES TO FOREIGN NOBLEMEN. Those good for nothing fellows marry American girls solely for their money, and some taxation scheme should be worked out to save at least a portion of this outgo. Besides, we want to keep young American heiresses in THIS country.

It does not seem equitable. These girls' fortunes have been all made by good Americans, FROM GOOD AMERICAN INDUSTRY and by good American brains.

Does it not seem utterly unfair that this garnering, this harvest, should be taken out of the country and be dumped into the pockets of some IDLE SCION OF NOBILITY who never did a stroke of work?

GARLANDS FOR SOLDIERS GRAVES

Memorial Day was generally observed throughout the country with appropriate exercises and flowers were placed upon the graves of the Union dead by their surviving brethern. It is a beautiful custom to thus remember those brave men who in the hour of their country's need did their duty as they saw it and laid down their lives in supporting the Union. In this day all are agreed that the preservation of the Union was worth all it cost in human blood and treasure but there is a growing liberality of thought toward those who fought on the Confederate side, for they too fought for what they believed in and in many thousands of cases out of loyalty to their State government after it had seceded. Devotion to duty, personal honor and herosim is the common heritage of Americans and was richly exemplified in the war between the States.

WANT TO BE U. S. SENATOR.

Hon. Joshua Frederick Cocky Talbott, the Baltimore county boss, is not the only Democrat turning longing eyes upon the senatorial toga when it shall fall from the shoulders of the venerable Senator Whyte. Hon. Joshua W. Miles announces his candidacy for the high station, and Ex-Governor Brown, while not avowedly a candidate, admits that he would like to go to the Senate.

Of the three Mr. Miles is undoubtedly best fitted to represent the State in the Upper House of Congress, the only objection to him, from a Republican standpoint, being that he is a rockribbed Democrat of so pronounced a type that it would take something more heretical and dangerous than the free silver craze to induce him to desist from active and vigorous support of his party.

All the gentlemen named seem to take it for granted that the next legislature will contain a sufficent number of Democratic members to insure the election of a Democrat as Senator Whyte's successor. In that, however, they may be mistaken and, if so, it will be decidedly to the advantage of the people of Maryland, and of the whole country, by contributing to the maintenance of the Republican majority in the Senate.

LOOKING BACKWARD.

The prevailing talk about late frosts and damaged crops was brought up to an interesting point on the floor of change yesterday though the recalling by James A. Loudon, one of the oldest active grain merchants in the city, of the of the destructive frost which visited this country on May 17, 1859, just forty-eight years ago yesterday.

"There are few who recall that frost,' he said, "but I have a very distinct recollection of it. That season, or spring like the present one, had crops and produce coaxed out early with mild, warm weather. Then came a sudden turn to cold, which resulted in the blighting frost of 48 years ago to-day. From the Mississippi river east, and you must remember there was nothing West at that time to amount to anything, crops were blighted. Prices jumped with leaps and bounds, and flour was shipped from Philadelphia to Pittsburg and from NewYork to Buffalo. Farmers, thinking that their crops had been ruined, went into the market and bought flour. I remember having an order for 200 barrels of flour, which I sold at a profit of $1.50 a barrel. After the excitement had died down there came a period of excellent growing weather and crops were resown."

The frost of May 17 was not the last for that season. On June 5 there was a heavy frost, and the river column of the Enquirer referred to it as follows:

"The decks of steamers were ornamented with this white mantle, which left the impression that even the most vigorous fruit must have been destroyed."

The editorial column of June 7 said: "The severe cold weather which was experenced in this vicinity on Saturday and Sunday, June 5 and 6, and which created a necessary for fire and great coats, has, as we feared, done much damage to the crop. We hear disastrous accounts of it from Cleveland, Zanesville and other places where the fruit was badly injured and the young corn destroyed."

By June 11 word had reached this city from Pittsburg of great damage done in that vicinity, and the Enquirer of that date carried the following extract from the Pittsburg Dispatch: "Fruit is seriously damaged by heavy frost on Sunday night. An extensive grower of grapes in this vicinity estimates his loss at $3,000. Another, residing near East Liberty says his apples and peaches are mainly, if not completely, ruined. The apples were frozen at the stems and dropped off by thousands when touched by the sun. On the south side of the river the gentleman describes the country as having the appearance of a land scorched by fire, so severe was the frost."

This wave of cold seems to have crossed the mountains and extended to the Atlantic Coast. An editorial in the Enquirer of Sunday, June 12, says: "We have accounts from Philadelphia and its vicinity of another severe frost which was experienced on the night of June 10 doing much damage to fruits aud crops. Before these late disastrous frosts there was every indication of the most abundant harvest the country has seen for for years. The damage they have done is incalculable."

The same day appeared a clipping from the Advertiser, of Rochester, N. Y., which after reciting the heavy frost and general damage, described some of the efforts which had been made to protect flowers and tender plants. It said: "The paper and cloths with which the plants were covered took the dew, froze solid, and become sheets of ice around the tender plants."

The same day the weather report said that the day before "was so cold that over-coats had to be worn."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

SIX COWS KILLED MONDAY.

Fatal Day For Live Stock Ruminating Along B. & O. Tracks at Swanton.

Six cows, owned by three individuals at Swanton, this county, were killed on the tracks of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company near Swanton Monday of this week.

Two of the animals were owned by Mr. John O'Brien and were killed by a freight train early in the day. Train No. 55, due at Swanton about three o'clock in the afternoon, killed four other cows, three of them being owned by Mr. Charles M. Miller and one by Mr. Wade Lohr.

In every case the cows were blooded stock and were quite valuable.

When Butte Was A Barren Desert.

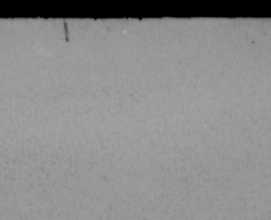
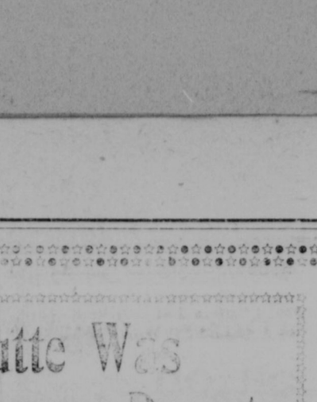
For five weeks last winter the city of Butte, Mont., was a barren desert. It was the driest place on earth. The water supply was all right, but owing to a strike all the newspapers were suspended.

Butte's experience proved that in this day and age the local newspaper is a public necessity. Nobody knew what was happening. False rumors spread like bad butter. Fake stories about citizens circulated by word of mouth until several duels almost resulted. There were no newspapers to tell the truth about things.



Business suffered worst of all. Merchants tried handbills, which didn't fill the bill. They worked the billboard over time, but only bored the public. The people cried for newspapers as babies cry for— (See ad.)



For once in the history of the world it was demonstrated beyond peradventure that a town without a live newspaper is a dead one. Stores could not do business without properly advertising their wares, and they could not advertise properly without newspaper space.

Butte merchants are now advertising to make up for lost time. Business men who didn't think much of advertising before have learned its value and are using newspaper space.

The experience of Butte carries a lesson for every other town—this one, for instance:

ADVERTISING PAYS ITS OWN WAY.

SLOPPY WEATHER.

Prognosticator Smith Promises Plenty of Moisture for June.

June is likely to continue wet, with an increase in the vigor of rainfall in a number of sections of the country. However, this order of rainfall will change after the end of the solstice periods. Local droughts will follow in a great number of sections, both in the west and south, and in parts favored with moisture too much is likely to prevail for agricultural purpose to secure all the crops.

As a general characteristic of the solstice period of the clouds are more heavily charged with electricity. Winds of much force will prevail in some localities and local downpours and floods confined to limited districts. The temperatue will be fluctuating till after the middle of the month—hot and cold waves will play on the meteorology through most of the month.

The first storm period of June will be central on or touching the 4th. A hot wave will denote the oncoming period of disturbance, which will discharge rain, hail, and also high winds will prevail. Clearing and cooler weather will follow about the 5th.

On or about the 9th more rain will develop, which is not likely to be general, however The portions touched by it will have vigorous showers and the clouds heavily charged with electricity.

The 13th or 14th will pass into a very hot wave, which will prove the most vigorous wave of the month, with rain, hail, wind and much electric display. The meteorology will clear about the 17th, bringing bracing and a cleared meteorology.

About the 21st or 22d a local rain wave will develop of much vigor, causing local floods, storms of wind, and much thunder and lightning.

The last storm period of the month will appear about the 27th.

DRIVING CAT OUT OF ATTIC

Oscar Neat Caused Powder Explosion Which May be Fatal to Him.

Oscar Neat, aged 17 years, a son of Noah Neat, a miner, living in Garrett county, about a mile and a half from Barton, was probably fatally burned by the explosion of a can of powder at his home Friday evening at 7 o'clock. Young Neat, who is employed at the Caledonia stables, upon returning home from work discovered a cat in the attic of his home. He lit a match in an endeavor to find the animal to chase it out and in some manner the lighted match ignited powder that had been spilled on the floor, which acting as a fuse to the powder can nearby exploding it, setting fire to the house and burning it to the ground with all its contents. Young Neat's injuries are very serious and he was taken to the Western Maryland Hospital Saturday morning. He is the second son of a large family of children, but the other children escaped injury. Mr. Neat, sr., was in Lonaconing at the time of the accident and did not arrive home until several hours after the explosion. The young man was taken to the home of George Langham where his injuries were dressed. The remainder of the homeless family are being cared for at the home of Mr. Wm. Russell.

THE DEATH RECORD.

ALVIN BITTINGER.

On Friday, May 24, 1907, at Bare Hill, Alvin, son of Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Bittinger, aged one year, three months and thirteen days. The deceased, whose loss will be deeply felt and mourned by the members of the household, was laid to rest in the Lutheran cemetery at Bittinger.

Oh! little Alvin's gone,
The darling laid away
To rest in peace till the bright
Morn of Eternal Day.

The farewell word is said,
The farewell kiss is given;
His body lies among the dead,
His soul at rest in Heaven.

Oh! Father, give us grace
To bear the chast'ning rod;
Help us to meet the smiling face
Of an indulgent God.

Help us to trust in Thee,
When darkness intervenes,
And may we pass on fearlessly
Through all life's darkest scenes.

MRS. JOHN BAKER.

Mrs. John Baker, aged eighty-three years, died on Sunday at the home of her son Henry Baker, near Johnson's, on the National Road, in District No. 9, and was buried at the Hostetler graveyard in Somerset county, Pa., on Tuesday. Mrs. Baker was twice married her first husband being named McIntyre. Two children resulted from this union. Her second husband, John Baker, died many years ago, leaving four sons, Messrs. Philip, Henry, Jacob and Simon Baker, all of whom are upright, progressive citizens of District No. 9.

BITTINGER.

A very pleasant Memorial Day celebration was held in this village on Thursday of last week. There were twelve servivors of the Civil War on the ground and took part in the exercises. The services began with a regular army bean soup dinner for the comrades at 1 o'clock, after which "the old boys" marched in regular military style to the village cemetery where with loving hands they scattered flowers on the graves of departed comrades. They then marched to the church nearby and were addressed in a masterly way by Attorney Hendrickson, of Cumberland. There were a large number of people present and the remainder of the day was spent in a social picnic.

Jacob Lohr, who left this section more than two years ago and located in St. George, Ga., and has been an inmate of the National Soldiers' Home in Tennessee for some time, surprised his friends here last week by his sudden return. Mr Lohr will visit here a month or two before returning to the home.

Thomas Hendershot and family moved to this village this week.

Perry Bowser returned last Sunday from California where he had been visiting for five weeks and he is loud in his praises of the Pacific slope.

J. W. Thomas, of Deer Park, was in this section last Monday and purchased some real estate.

T. J. Lohr was in Oakland on business early this week.

Dr. Webster Ravenscroft, of Oakland, was looking after some timber tracts near here last week.

Clarence Brenneman went over to Springs, Pa., last Monday where he will be employed as a teamster.

Mr. A. R. Roderick, foreman for Mr. W. A. Liller, who has the contract for erecting the new court house in Oakland arrived here yesterday morning and will begin the preliminary work as soon as the weather conditions permit.

Ex-County Commissianer Taylor Friend, of near Friendsvilie, was in Oakland a day or two this week attending court as a witness in a land case. Mr. Friend returned to his home yesterday afternoon.

Rev. J. A. McClelland, the new pastor of Grafton's Presbyterian Church, was formally installed as such on Tuesday night, with ceremonies of an appropriate and impressive character.—Grafton Leader.

Attorney Fred T. Martin spent yesterday at Oakland, the guest of his family, who are summering there. The Martin family have one of the most beautiful homes in that city of architectural correctness.—Grafton Republican.

The Board of County Commissioners in session Monday and Tuesday adjourned yesterday morning after transacting routine business and asking for bids for the erection of a number of bridges, advertisements for which appear in this paper today.

Among the representative citizens of District No. 2 who were in Oakland this week on court business and otherwise were Messas. Samuel Falkner, Jacob S. Myers, J. G. Kolb, Cornelius W. Friend, P. S. Friend, Clarence V. Guard and R. M. Holman, all of whom have numerous friends and acquaintance in Oaklaud who were pleased to meet them.

The men and women who try to make their home the most interesting spot on earth for each other, and for their friends and those who are near and dear to them, have but occasional use for the club. It is to them, like the theatre, a pleasant place to enter now and then but not a spot to dwell in.

We will offer a little free advice to the young men and young ladies who read this paper. Never marry until you are certain that single life is a failure and under no circumstances marry until you find some one that will have you. Be sure you are right, then go ahead. Boys, remember that a girl rigged out in ribbons and paint may look good enough to eat; but that smile however, may be made to order and come off with her best cloths.

If you don't just like everything you see in your home paper, go around the streets and howl. The editor is never supposed to make a mistake and of course cannot do so. Other people can, but the editor is ubiquitous, omniscient, omnipotent, "omniverous." If you can't see a good point, don't fail to see a bad one. If a thousand pleasant things are said of people, hunt for something unpleasant. If you don't find it, howl some more; if you do, howl anyway. Never mind your own business; watch for something to find fault with in some other man's business, this will make you great.

The old saying that an "idle brain is the devil's work shop and idle hands his tools." Oh, how true this saying is. It is to this shop that the tattler goes for material wherewith to blight some happy home or attempt to ruin the character and reputation of their fellowman by falsifying his good name, and forever destroying his bright prospects for the future. You cannot realize how low down and comtemptible a village tattler is, until you have seen some of the results of their tattlers tales.

Sunday was one of the coldest and most disagreeable days of the present peculiar season. Although the calendar marked the date as the second of June, when all should be warm and brightness overcoats added to the comfort of pedestrians, and it may be gambled on that there were more people remained indoors than went out. Even "the oldest inhabitants" have quit trying to compare this season, for they cannot remember a comparison. It is predicted however, that July, August and September will be unusally warm months, so we may yet remember with feelings of appreciation that we wore overcoats the second day of June.

The Standard Oil Company, where pipe line pass throught the State of Pennsylvania a few feet north of the Maryland line, has connected up its eight-inch pipes at the top of Savage Mountain, near Finzel, the work having been completed a few days ago. This makes the greatest trunk line of pipes in the world, carrying fifty thousand barrels of oil every day to eastern cities. These pipes carry oil from Kansas, West Virginia and Pennsylvania, amounting to the aggregate to over $18,000,000 worth annually. A new pumping station for this line is being built near Finzel.

SUNNYSIDE.

The afternoon picnic and base ball at this place last Thursday was played with good success. The contesting sides were Oakland and Sunnyside. The game began at 2:30 p. m. During the game the Oakland boys acted very kind and were jovial to the home club. We are not imformed how many innings and scores were made, but we do know that Sunnyside was the winning club.

Miss Cara Dodge called on the Misses Buncutter one day last week.

Andrew Rolf took supper with Joshua Brenninger last Wednesday.

AN OBSERVER.

FOR RENT—Dwelling of eight rooms; never failing spring; large lot; good stable and outbuildings. Apply at this office or at Sincell & Co.'s store.

ROBBERY SATURDAY NIGHT.

Store of Messrs. Lantz Brothers Broken Into and $50 Worth of Goods Taken.

Sometime between midmight Saturday and daylight Sunday morning the store of Messrs. Lantz Brothers, located in the Little building corner Third and Oak streets, was entered by burglars and goods to the amount of $50 or more stolen.

Entrance to the store was effected through the front door which was forced by a crowbar stolen from the tool house of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. Adjoining the Lantz store is located the meat store of W. D. Dixon, which was also entered by the burglars through a communicating door connecting the two rooms. Nothing from the latter store, however, was stolen.

The goods taken from the Lantz store consisted of shoes, jewelry, neckwear, etc. A number of cartons which contained the stolen shoes were found along the railroad track a short distance east of Oakland, and it is the supposition that the robbery was committed by a band of four tramps who spent the day at the pumping station of the railroad at the foot of Fourth street.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The weather continues unsettled, yet our summer visitors continue to come.

Cottages are being rented every day but there are still a number not yet taken.

Dr. B. Frank Laughlin and Miss Sue Rebecca Browning were married at the residence of the bride's parents, Blaine, W.Va., Wednesday. After a tour of ten days or two weeks they will be at home in Mountain Lake Park.

Preaching in the Hall of Philosophy Sunday evening at 8 o'clock by Rev. Dr. W. W. Davis. Everybody invited.

The repairs to the M. E. church will be completed and the regular services resumed Sunday, June 16th.

Since our last report the following cottages have been rented for the summer: The Waugh cottage and the Custer cottage, on D street, the Jarboe cottage on Baltimore avenue and the Spitzer cottage on I street. The latter cottage is occupied by Mr. E. W. Williams and family, of Clarksburg.

Mrs. P. T. Garthright has been quite ill for some time.

A little son of Rev. and Mrs. Lee is seriously ill at the residence of Mr. A. R. Sperry.

A little son of Mr. and Mrs. Roderick, residing on the Major Burns farm near the Park, was fatally burned a few days ago and died in a few hours thereafter.

Major J. M. Burns was among our visitors this week. The Major and family will occupy their cottage here the latter part of this month.

Mrs. Parran Deakins (nee Mamie Deffinbaugh) sold her summer cottage here to Rev. Mr. Preston. Mr. C. W. Hopkins negotiated the sale.

Mrs. Gilbert, who spent the winter with her daughter in Parkersburg, is in her cottage on G street.

Captain Maulsby is now occupying his cottage in Cosy Row.

Mrs. Cady, of Clarksburg, W. Va., will have the management of Queenwood Hotel this season.

The electric light plant was started up last Saturday, under the management of Mr. Crandell, of Baltimore, and Jno. D. Hayden, of the Park.

FIKE.

The weather during the past week here has been cool with the exception of one or two days.

The corn is not coming up as yet and a number of farmers are afraid that it will not come up at all.

The oats are growing slowly but unless we have more good weather, the crops will be small throughout.

Mr. Jasper Fike is still taking pictures and is making good success.

Mr. John S. Fike and wife were at the Barnthouse cemetery one day last week beautifying the graves of their friends and relatives.

It is evident that Mr. L. K. Fike has succeeded in getting a buddy to make trips to Fearer, Md., for you can hear L. K. talk to Jasper Fike by telephone and make arrangements to travel in company. I would say L. K. Fike should go to Fearer June 8, 1907. I tell him this for I heard that he would like to know when to go.

Mr. Owen Evans rides around at present with a fatherly smile, for a baby boy arrived at their home on May 28th.

The Bowser Bros. and John R. Fike have finished cutting timber on the Henry Lee property.

Mr. A. T. Fike is ill at this writing.

George W. Bowser is also sick at present. We hope that both will soon be well.

The teachers of this place are patiently awaiting the examination which they will likely attend at Accident on the 20th inst.

Mr. Joshua Burgess was seen one day last week at Mr. John Hileman saw mill on business.

Mr. George E. Wass passed through here last week selling fertilizer for buckwheat.

There are a large number of young colts in this section being bred from the $3000 Percheon horse, owned by the Markleysburg Horse Co., and this fall if any one would want to purchase a good young colt he could surely find one to suit him around here.

Married.

FRANKLIN—MITCHELL—One of the very prettiest weddings ever solemnized in Oakland took place at St. Paul's M. E. church on Tuesday evening, June 4th, at eight o'clock, when Miss Mary Adeline Mitchell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John T. Mitchell, of Oakland, became the bride of Mr. Thomas Franklin, of Roanoke, Va. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Henry Hamill, of Winchester, uncle of the bride, in presence of a very large number of invited guests, admission to the church being obtained by cards. The bride, attired in a magnificent robe of princess lace over white taffeta, with a flowing vail, and carrying a bonquet of bride's roses and lillies of the valley, entered the church on the arm of her father, being attended by her sister Miss Rose Mitchell, as maid of honor. At the chancel rail of the church the bride was met by the groom. The maid of honor was gowned in pink silk and carried pink roses, while the bridesmaids, Misses Bess Offutt, Grace Jones, Joe Robinson and Annie Grant, were attired very beautifully in gowns of white organdie and carried pink carnations. Master John Mitchell, brother of the bride, was ring bearer. Mr. John Woodruff, of Roanoke, Va., was the groom's best man and the ushers were Harry W. McComas, Stuart and Byrne Hamill, and Bowie Johnson. Miss Lottie Loar, as organist of the church, played the wedding march from Lohengrin. After the church ceremony a reception was held at the home of the bride at which delightful refreshments were served, the couple leaving on a later train for a tour of the South. The will reside in Roanoke, where the groom holds a very lucrative position with one of the railroad lines entering that city. The bride has a large circle of friends in Oakland whose good wishes follow her.

SOMMERVILLE — STICKLEY — A few days ago the interesting information leaked out that Miss Emily Stickley, who for several years past has made her home in Oakland with her aunt, Miss Nell Turley, had been married early last March to Mr. Sidney H. Sommerville, a leading attorney practicing at the Taylor county (W. Va.) bar, the wedding having been kept a secret by the parties and their relatives up to this time. The many friends of both parties will he delighted to learn of the wedding and will be delighted to extend their congratulations. Speaking of the event the Grafton Sentinel of Tuesday says: "Miss Stickley, who is prominent in social circles in her home city is well known in Grafton having visited here frequently in years passed and the people of Grafton will be glad to welcome her. At the present time she is reported to be lying seriously ill at her home, a fact to be greatly regretted and her husband has gone to Oakland to be at her bedside during her illness. The friends of the couple here and elsewhere will hope that she will soon recover her former health. The news of the wedding of Mr. Sommerville and Miss Stickley came as a great surprise to their many friends here as such a thing was not even thought of. It is expected that as soon as Mrs. Sommerville recover from her present sickness that they will come here and make their home in the future."

BOYER—ANDERSON—At the Schley Hotel, by Rev. E. Manges, on Saturbay, June 1st, Miss Jeanette Anderson and Mr. Stanley Elmer Boyer, both of Fairmomt, West. Va., were joined in the holy bonds of wedlock. The groom is a son of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Boyer, and is well known in Oakland. The bridal party was accompanied to Oakland by the groom's sister, Miss Mary Boyer, and returned to Fairmont Monday morning, where they will reside.

Dealing With the Lives of the Hardy Pioneer of Allegany County.

SOMERSET, May 25.—In the year 1754 there was no wagon road over the Allegheny mountain, only two Indian trails, except the road built in that year by Colonel Washington from Fort Cumberland. In 1754, during the French and Indian war, a Provincial road was built from Shippensburg to within a few miles of a junction with the Washington road at Turkeyfoot. While this road was built under the direction and management of Colonel James Burd, it was generally known as the Burd road. It passed through Raystown along the banks of the Juniata, and thence southwest to Turkeyfoot.

During the year 1758 a military road was absolutely necessary for the investment and reduction of Fort Duquesne by General John Forbes' army. The Virginia authorities insisted that the road should be built from Fort Cumberland, but Colonel Boquet determined, and very promptly built the road from Raystown. The Forbes road passed along the north bank of Shawnee Cabin creek, thence to foot of Allegheny mountain gaining the bench of the mountain, across swamps and little mountain brooks, where General Forbes encamped, pitched his tents and threw up breastworks for the protection of his troops and a garrison, hence the little mountain brook derives it name, Breastwork run. The Forbes military road opened up a direct route to the Ohio river.

For many years after the capture of Fort Duquesne, Fort Bedford was used as a basis of supplies for the west, and northwest along the frontier. Practically the Forbes road was used for travel and transportation between the two forts, Cedford and Fort Pitt, until the year 1773.

General Braddock's march from Fort Cumberland in 1755 to assault and reduce Fort Duquesne held by the French and Indians, met with a sad disaster. But for the military genius and prowess of Colonel Washington the entire army would have been lost and destroyed. In General Braddock's western campaign he employed Lieutenant John Fraser, the Indian scout-trader, preacher and inn-keeper, a friend of Colonel Washington. On the fatal morning when General Braddock was surprised and the French and Indians lay in ambush for the bloody assault, Mrs. Jean Fraser prepared, cooked and served breakfast for General Braddock and Colonel Washington and staff. Lieutenant John Fraser and wife, Jean, resided in Virginia in 1755 and he accompanied Colonel Washington's army west as a guide and scout.

After General Braddock's defeat and terrible disaster, the army returned to Cumberland. Some months thereafter while near Fort Cumberland, Mrs. Jean Fraser was captured by the Indians, a tribe of the Six Nations, and taken as far west as Ohio, Muskingum county. She was adopted by the great chief and held among his squaws in the lodge or wigwam of the chief. After a number of years of captivity she made her escape, planning it by strategy and will power and hiding away a meagre supply of food for the journey through the wilderness to reach her destination. But to her great perplexity a little favorite dog took up her trail and followed her to where she crawled into a hollow log, weary, foot-sore and exhausted for rest from the long journey through the wilderness to reach her destination. In her great extremity and to avoid detection by the pursuit of the Indians on her trail she was obliged to kill the little dog to keep him from barking and revealing her hiding place. For several years Mrs. Jean Fraser was held a captive in the far-off wilderness. Despondent, she longed for her home, her friends and civilization; the opportunity came and she fled for her freedom.

Long years rolled round in suspense: all hope gone, John Fraser accepted the hand of another woman with a solemn vow between the contracting parties that if the first wife returned his second wife would surrender her claim peacefully and without a murmur. Afterward Mrs. Jean Fraser returned to her husband and friends, to conciliate his second wife and all parties concerned, Mr. Fraser erected a cabin on his improvement for wife No. 2, where she lived until the end came the following year.

The order book of General John Forbes contains orders issued during the campaign of 1755 against Fort Duquesne, from the 21st of September to the 24th of November, in camp at Raystown. As early as 1748 some prominent citizens of the Province of Virginia had organized a company to establish settlements in the upper Ohio and procured a grant from the British government of a large body of land.

Lawrence and Augustine Washington were interested in the enterprise. Christopher Gist, an agent of the company, made a journey to examine and report on the timber, land, ect., in the fall of 1751, starting from the residence of Thomas Cresap, at a point near Oldtown, Md. In 1752 he held a council with the Ohio Indians and and procured their consent to erect a town or fort at McKees Rock, at the mouth of Chartiers Creek, a few miles below Pittsburg, which was regarded as important in natural advantages as the forks of the Ohio. Consequently that point was selected and Captain Trent's company of 100 men began the erection of a fort in the spring of 1754 The French in four weeks had erected Fort Duquesne. In July of that year a French force of 900 men under Du Villier compelled Washington with 300 men, then en route to reinforce Captain Trent, to withdraw at the Great Meadows.

On July 9th General Braddock with an army of 1,200 men advanced to attack the fort, but he was defeated and killed at the mouth of Turtle Creek by the French and Indians under the command of General Contecocus.

General Forbes arrived at Raystown on the 21st of September, a portion of the army during the months of May and June concentrating there under the command of General Boquet.

A number of soldiers at Raystown were convicted of desertion and they were pardoned by Doyle who was shot on the 28th of September.

Friday, October 13, 1758, the First Virginia regiment marched for Loyal Hanna under the command of Colonel Washington. The regiment camped at Shawnese Cabin Saturday, October 14th. An order, evidently by Colonel Washington, directs that all officers must put on what dress they think proper tomorrow. The camp of the First Virginia was at Edward's Swamp. (Breastwork Run.)

Sunday, October 15th, at Stonycreek, now Stoyestown; Monday, the 16th, at Muddy Rnn; Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday following, at White Oak Ridge; on the 21st at the southeast side of Laurel Hill; October 22d, at the northwest side of Laurel Hill, and October 28th at Loyal Hanna.

BUSINESS-POLITICS.

If the following represented more than the idle talk of the day it would pass as important:

"Democrats connected with corporations in New York and other states declare that never again will they support a Republican candidate for president or governor. They have been doing this, they say, since 1896, in the belief that Republican candidates for President and governor would be safer for the business interests, as represented by these corporation Democrats according to their testimony, are in the future to support the candidates of the Democratic party for governor and President on the theory that no matter how radical the views of their candidates, they will at least know what manner of men they are getting. These corporation Democrats insist that they have given their campaign contributions and votes to Republicans candidates for President and governor who have as a recompense turned upon them and injured them in a business way.

"Republican corporation men are in the same boat as their Democratic corporation allies, and the Republican corporation men are as indignant and hostile in this matter, perhaps more so than their Democratic business brethren.

"It is an old saying in national political circles that no candidate for President was ever elected to whom the business interests of the county were opposed."

Commenting upon the above the Washington Star says:

"Democratic business men by the thousands gave their votes to Mr. McKinley both in 1896 and 1900, and were certainly not disappointed. It was claimed by the managers of the first McKinley campaign that Republican success would mean a general rivival of business and never did politicans speak more truly. Business, of all kinds, revived immediately. Orders began pouring in upon manufacturers, the mills were opened, wages were raised, and the armies of men left the roads, where they had been tramping in search of work, and returned home, where work awaited them. Mr. McKinley's re-election was easy, prosperity was so great it carried the day over Mr. Bayan's eloquence, giving the Republicans a larger majority than before. Business had boomed beyond all previous figures, and wageearners had more money to their credit in savings banks than ever before. Business men of all parties were delighted with the situation. In 1904 the tide of prosperity was still running so high it was idle to talk of a charge to business men. The Parker campaign was a sort of politicians' masquerade. Under color of solicitude for the general welfare a huddle of factions patched up a truce among themselves, and made play for the federal offices. But the movement was predestined to failure. General Prosperity and Colonel Theodore Roosevelt put the combination to complete rout, and business continued to boom. It is still booming, notwithstanding a few flurries in Wall street brought about by stock gamblers and their kind. Next year the business interests are going to do what they previously done—consider and act according to business lights. They are not, because they could not afford to be, influenced in politics either by sentiment or revenge. They support what is best for themselves and for the people. If, therefore prosperity continues, and the Republicans nominate good men on a platform supporting what has been done for the country since 1897 and promising safe policies for future, the chances are a hundred to one that the Republican ticket will again draw largely from the business interests in every state where there are real party contests."

Honorable Mention.

By ADELE TALIAFERRO PAGE.

IT had been a busy day at General Alton's headquarters. Indeed, those were all busy days in the weeks that immediately followed the battle of Shiloh, the taking of Island No. 10 and the later occupation by General Pope of Corinth.

In the heart of the little city of Jackson, Tenn., General Alton had established his headquarters. At his desk here, long after taps had sounded, his lights gave evidence that when the men in the ranks are asleep uneasy is still the head of the officer in command.

An orderly noiselessly entered the room where General Alton was at his desk. Silently he saluted and waited for some sign of recognition. He had to wait some minutes before General Alton, without looking up from his letters, said, "Well, orderly?"

"Colonel Curtis presents his compliments to General Alton, begs to report matters of importance and asks an immediate interview."

The general laid down his pen. "Show him in, orderly."

As the colonel entered General Alton rose, and the two grave faced men looked questioningly at each other. In those days "matters of importance" generally stood for disaster and necessity for quick action.

"General Alton," the crisp voice of Colonel Curtis began, "a prisoner, a spy, has been arrested attempting to pass the lines. In the search in his shoes were found concealed a complete and thorough drawing of the strengthened fortifications of Corinth and papers bearing information on supplies, condition of men, etc."

The general turned to the speaker a face full of interest. "That's bad, Colonel Curtis, very bad. Tell me something of the personality of the prisoner."

"I did not see him until the papers had been discovered and the evidence of his being a spy established. He is a mere boy, not more than twenty years old, I am sure. He has been a soldier—of that I am convinced—and good blood runs in his veins. I think him a native of this section of Tennessee. His accent indicates that."

"You ordered the search?"

"No; Captain Lawton did."

"The specifications and papers were found in his shoes?"

"Yes, general, hidden between a false sole."

General Alton looked gravely straight in front of him. He was thinking deeply. Colonel Curtis was no sensationalist, and he had suggested a serious charge in this interview.

The specifications and detail of an important supply point within the possession of the Union forces, under careful guard and strict martial law, were now in the hands of this spy of the enemy. The specifications and supply detail had been a surprise in their manner of making to this trained soldier. In his long experience with men General Alton had never found that untrained hands did these things well. The prisoner was a mere boy with no likelihood of experience or practice in this work.

LOOKED QUESTIONINGLY AT EACH OTHER

"You base your opinion entirely, Colonel Curtis, on the character of the drawings and the personality of the prisoner?"

"Yes, general. I am personally convinced that the work is that of an expert with time and detail well in hand. This mere boy has, I believe, neither the knowledge, time nor skill to do the work and could not possibly have obtained some information contained in the papers."

Colonel Curtis waited patiently until the general finished his work and put maps and papers back into the drawer. He leaned back in his chair with a thoughtful, grave face. It was events like these that made the business of war so grim and dreadful.

The same thought doubtless was in the mind of both men. The general must order a court martial, which must pass a death sentence on this boy, who, after all, was doing the hardest and most undesired duty a soldier is called upon to do.

General Alton broke the silence. "I have decided, Colonel Curtis, to offer this prisoner his life on condition that he reveals all that he knows about these papers."

Colonel Curtis rose, feeling the interview was over.

"We will make the hearing at 7:30 tomorrow morning, if you please, colonel, and I will have Captain Lawton also present. In the meantime detail a special guard for the prisoner and see that he has comfortable care. Good night."

The footsteps died away down the long, empty hall, and General Alton was again alone. It had been a hard day, and he was glad it was over. The gravity of this last complication made his face unusually old and worn. For some weeks strange things of this kind had come to light. Now this must prove a solution of what had never been understood.

"Can it be," he thought wonderingly, "that in all the world there is a man so base as to sell for money the information a soldier would die to preserve?"

Then he fell to thinking of the boy whose life lay in his hands and of all the stern justice of war. Involuntarily his hand rested on a letter with a northern postmark. It had come to him from Princeton that morning. Before him passed the eager, pleading words of his son, urging, imploring his father to let him give up college and go to the front. "The soldier blood," the letter ran, "the blood of all the Altons, is calling to me day and night, making study impossible. I do not desire to grieve you by giving up my work without your consent, but I am no longer sure of myself. Let me do what my conscience urges me to do. When peace is declared I will take up my profession if you desire it."

He must consent, of course. Richard was a man now and must make a man's fight for the old flag. Perhaps some day in the fortunes of war his only son, his fine, brilliant Richard, would stand as this boy stood today—under the shadow of death.

The prisoner, in his well guarded tent, had spent one of those never to be forgotten nights that most of us can remember somewhere in life. There was little doubt of his fate, and with a strange, awed look on his young face, telling of the night's conflict, he waited for the hour of the interview. He knew nothing of the offer to be made him and felt that it was only a preliminary of his death warrant. He longed, with a boyish longing, for his uniform to wear this morning. In that gray and all it stood for he felt he could better face the worst.

General Alton, Colonel Curtis and Captain Lawton were talking earnestly when the orderly announced the prisoner and his guard.

"How young, pitifully young," was the thought that was in their minds as the prisoner courteously saluted and stood at attention. The excitement of the moment had brought back a faint color in the cheeks and taken the weariness from the face.

General Alton faced the boy with keen scrutiny. "You understand, do you, that you are under the gravest charge in military law?" the general began, his voice full of the stern command of the soldier.

"I do, General Alton," the boy replied quietly.

The young officer, acting as the general's secretary, prepared to take his notes. The examination had commenced.

"What is your name?"

"Seton Dabney, suh."

"Where do you live?"

"My home is in Fulaski, suh."

The general paused in the examination. There was something a trifle disconcerting in the frank, boyish face strangely suggesting that other boy in a northern town, restless for the life which had brought this one to grief.

When the general spoke next his voice had lost much of the sternness and impersonality. When General Alton chose to take that tone it was difficult to resist him always.

"Mr. Dabney, may I ask, is your father's name Edwin Dabney, and was he first lieutenant in the old Sixteenth Virginia in the Mexican war?"

The prisoner looked surprised; then a smile of pleasure warmed his face. "Yes, suh; his name is Edwin Dabney, and he belonged to the old Sixteenth Virginia. It was the delight of my childhood to hear him tell those stories of army life. When the trouble came between the states I begged with all my heart to go with my father in the Ninth Tennessee. I was only eighteen and the only son, and father wished me to continue my studies at the Virginia Military Institute and so be with mother while he was away. At the end of a year he found it was no use. I could not study. I had to be a soldier.

"I was in the battle of Shiloh," the boyish voice went on, "and I did my best for honorable mention. I did not get it then, but if I could live I felt my chance would come. This attempt to gain certain details was necessary. I volunteered for the task. I knew the country well, for I had hunted all over every inch of it. Perhaps for many reasons it seemed wise to let me try, and I was given my chance. I did my best, general," and the voice broke a little, "but—I failed; that is all."

The boy stopped abruptly.

"Mr. Dabney"—it was the general speaking in the same courteous voice still—"it is a sad thing, these fortunes of war. You have only tried to do your duty, and as soldiers we must do ours. The plans for the fortifications of Corinth, all details of supplies, are found in your possession and you in disguise.

"Colonel Curtis, Captain Lawton and myself feel confident that the work of details is not yours or any other inexperienced hand, and it was literally a matter of impossibility for you to gain without aid the information given in these papers. There has been treachery somewhere.

"In my capacity of division commander I am prepared to offer you your life on the condition that you reveal everything—names, rank and amount of bribe—for which this information was sold.

"I knew your father, Mr. Dabney. We were both young soldiers in the days of the old Sixteenth Virginia. I honored him greatly. I do not believe his son would do less than despise any man, whatever the needs or consideration, who sells a soldier's information. It may be that it is a Tennesseean in Union ranks either masking as a Federal soldier or half hearted in our cause. If it is the clever work of a Confederate spy (which is most unlikely), you will doubtless refuse to reveal his identity. If it is a man who has sworn loyalty to the old flag your father and I fought under together, surely you must realize how low in the scale of honor he is to do this thing. Reveal his name, help us to punish the traitor and take your life and its possibilities. I cannot promise you freedom, but I do promise you shall be sent away as a prisoner of war and that I will keep you in mind in the exchange.

"I WISH TO SPEAK TO GENERAL ALTON AT ONCE."

"You are young, and life is all before you. You are the only son of your father and mother. Think well before you leave them desolate. I hope I am a man of honor. You must be your own judge whether in this case you can in honor reveal what we ask you to. Life would not compensate you for dishonor. Be your own judge. It is only fair to tell you that if you refuse I can do nothing for you. The usual order of military law must take its course. I will give you an hour to consider the matter in all its features. Orderly, show Mr. Dabney into another room and order the guard to remain outside of the door. If the prisoner wishes to speak to me at any time, he is to be brought to me."

Seton Dabney bowed and saluted and passed out with the orderly. Alone in the empty room, he faced the situation. At twenty years the thought of life is sweet beyond words. He had thought for gold the information he must give his life for. The traitor was utterly unworthy of his silence, but he had given his word.

Far away, over the brown fields, his eyes and thoughts traveled. His home, his mother and father and happy boyhood passed in quick review in his surging thoughts. Could he save his life? Was this his one chance?

He had prayed for an answer. He seemed to hear his father's voice giving it in the same loving, gentle voice that was a part of his whole life, and the words were familiar with long, happy years of memories. "It is not worth while to gain a desired end by an undesired means, my son; it is not worth while for a Dabney."

"No! God helping me, no!" the boy cried aloud in his anguish. "It is not worth while!"

* * * * * * *

"Corporal!" called a voice from the room. The key turned, and the guard entered. Seton Dabney turned a set face to the soldier in blue. "I wish to speak to General Alton at once."

A moment later the prisoner stood in his old place. General Alton was now alone. He saluted and waited.

"You have made a decision, Mr. Dabney? Think well," the older man went on, "before you answer. There is still time to consider. You can extend the hour."

Clear and strong came the answer: "I thank you, General Alton; I do not wish more time. It is safer for me to answer now. I have decided."

The head was raised with a little gesture of pride. "I am an American and a Tennesseean. I must die so that neither will be ashamed of me. I cannot give any information."

The words were said simply. He hesitated one moment and then spoke again: "Allow me, General Alton, to say the persons you claim sold me information were not Tennesseeans. I would have shot them myself had such been the case. I thank you for your kindness to me. I could not break my word."

General Alton rose. He came to the boy and held out his hand. There was a strange look of sorrow in his face.

"My boy," he said softly, "some day perhaps your father and I will meet again. You did not get your honorable mention that day at Shiloh. You have won it now."

A MISTAKEN IDEA.

But Just the Same the Cook Gave Very Short Notice.

"Our priceless jewel of a cook has left us, and my wife says that I am to blame," says Jones, with a sorry grin. "The worst of it is that my wife is right.

"Mary had been with us for over ten years, and we had begun to think that we owned her. She had but one fault, and that was that she sometimes overslept and delayed the early breakfast that I am obliged to have.

"To remedy this I bought an alarm clock, and after explaining to the cook how it worked I told her that hereafter I expected her to arise immediately after the alarm sounded.

"The next morning I was awakened by a heavy crash from the cook's room, and while I was wondering what the trouble was there was a crash against my bedroom door, and the voice of Mary said:

"'There's your old alar-rum clock, an' it's meself that'll no longer stay in a place where a poor hardworking gurl's life is in danger.'

"I arose at once and investigated. It seems that the bed in the cook's room was an old one and not very stout, and when the alarm sounded the cook awoke with a jump that shook the bed to pieces and threw her out on the floor.

"I tried my best to convince her that it was an accident and not a part of the clock's duties to throw her out of bed every morning, but she wouldn't be convinced that the clock didn't have a hand in it and left."—Detroit Free Press.

Too Wet.

The crew of a certain life saving station on the New England coast has had little to do of late because of the rarity of wrecks in that immediate vicinity. Nevertheless the crew had in the past frequently proved its bravery and efficiency.

The practice drills of the crew last summer drew much satirical comment from the people at the summer resorts near by, who looked upon such practice as an entertainment devised for their especial amusement.

One rainy day at the appointed time the crew failed to appear at practice. The summer boarders on the veranda of the hotel waited in vain for the exhibition which should vary the monotony of a dull day. Finally one of them went over to the quarters of the crew to learn the reason.

"Aren't you going to practice today?" asked he.

"Not today, sir."

"Why not?"

Then the brave life saver, hero of many rough seas in the past, made an explanatory gesture toward the sky and said:

MY EXPERIENCE

As a Minister of the Gospel.

BY REV. D. A. FRIEND.

Brethren of the Ministerial Association and ladies and gentlemen of the audience :

The only apology that I shall offer for speaking in this paper so definitely of my own experience, is that the subject as assigned to me by my brethren restricts me to that line of thought.

All properly taught persons believe in a Divine call the the sacred office of the Minister of the Gospel; or, that God calls His own ministers to represent Christ and His Divinity among men, and the sacred Word informs us (1st Cor. 1:26) that not many wise men after the flesh, "not many mighty, not many noble are called ; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty." And while this seems to be his general plan yet I am fully persuaded that the office of the Minister of the Gospel of Christ is the highest and the holiest, and when filled in the spirit of its Divine author is the most honorable office ever conferred upon mortal man.

Into this holy office it has pleased God to call this man, and as one of the Divinely called I desire never to forget the block from which I have been hewn and the "hole of the pit from which I have been digged."

For ten years I hesitated and shrank from taking upon myself the awful responsibilities of this sacred office; and yet, all this time, strange to say, I was a diligent student of theology and of the Word of God, and trying to excuse myself from the ministry by being faithful along many other lines of Christian work. During this period there was always something that bore heavily upon my heart; something that seemed to say : "You are not doing your full duty;" until at length my soul was in distress. It was not that I was guilty of any known sin, for I was earnestly endeavoring to live a pure and holy life, and I spent much time in prayer and communion with God. But to no man did I utter a word concerning these things. It was a matter alone between God and myself. Nor did I unburden my heart to my wife for I knew her soul was averse to such things. But the time came when I must tell her or my heart would break. It was at the noon meal as we were seated at the table, after a blessing had been asked, that I unbosomed my heart to her. She wept bitterly as she made the expression: "It is just what I have been expecting all these years, and I have always thought that the most detestable thing was to be dragged about over the country as a Methodist minister's wife." It was a moment of a most painful character and it seemed as though every foundation was giving away beneath me. Our faces were both bathed in tears, and, although the dinner was real nice, neither of us tasted of it. I asked her to take the matter with me to the Lord, which she promised to do, and I knew that she would for she was a good woman. For two full weeks nothing was said by either of us concerning the matter, but I could see that a deep struggle was going on in her heart. But she finally gained the victory and laughingly said she would go with me to the ends of the earth, if I knew that God called me to preach the Gospel. I said "Glory!" for I knew that God had triumphed in her heart as well as mine.

From this time forth arrangements were being made for entering the regular ministry. Wife was always true to her promise of that hour, and side by side with me she has fought the battle for twenty-five long years.

Life with us has not all been sunshine. Dark hours and heart pangs have been our experience at times ; but if ever discouragements or privations pressed our souls the outside world was none the wiser; for we have one dear friend in whom we have always confided and to whom we have always gone when our hearts were pressed with heavy burdens, and never has he rejected our claim and never for a single moment has he left or forsaken us.

We have been fed on "cold shoulder" sometimes by those who ought to have been our best friends, but our policy has been to never let on, but to treat our enemies as though we expected them some day to be among our warmest friends. We have at times been cast into the lions' den, but the angel of the Lord never failed to be with us and has always shut the lions' mouths that they have not hurt us. For a few times we have had our "fiery furnace" experiences but One like unto the Son of God always walked with us in the midst of the fire and we have been brought forth without the smell of fire upon our garments. It is a cunning device of the devil to prompt his servants to always be speaking evil of the ministry. You will even meet members of our own church sometimes who will speak in the highest terms of a gambler or cutthroat and who will praise the good qualities of a saloon keeper and if he speaks at all of the minister it is always in a doubtful or a disparaging tone. While I speak of the above mentioned things, they have been the exception and not by far the rule of our experience.

In the twenty-five years of my experience as a minister I have never at any time nor in any place allowed myself to be at war with my brethren of other denominations, for God never called me to battle against or abuse the faith of my brethren of other divisions of His grand army, and the minister who does it will wake up in eternity to find that he has been playing a losing game.

As a minister of the Gospel "I magnify mine office." It has brought me into the companionship of thousands of the best of men and the purest of women, with whom I expect one day to walk with Christ in white.

In these years my ministerial labors have been a great blessing to my own soul, and although one of the least of all of God's ministering servants, I trust I have been the instrument in His hands of helping hundreds of persons into the experience of a better life. By His grace and goodness He has enabled me to see a thousand souls hapily saved at the altar of prayer. They were mostly from the ranks of the young and of those of tender years.

One of the greatest glories of my life today is to preach the Gospel to a dying world, and to do what lies in my power for the overthrow of evil and the promotion of good.

We are now where the people begin to call us old; we have passed the meridian of life and we are gradually starting down the sunset side. I have spent a good many glorious days in the service of God, and the Lord and I have good times together still. We do not know how much of our time is yet before us. We have but little care about that, but we shall continue to live as though we expected to live forever, and to daily cling to the Cross of Christ as though we may die tomorrow.

In God is all our trust, in Christ is all our hope and to God be all the glory forever. Amen.

ALTAMONT.

Owing to the inclemency of the weather literary was postponed Saturday night until June 8th.

Prof. Groves organized a singing class at this place on Sunday evening.

Mr. H. A. Schmidt was in Oakland on business Monday.

Mr. Pearl Martin, who has been employed as clerk for D. E. Offutt & Sons, Oakland, for some time, was here on Saturday en route for Parkersburg, W. Va., where, he informs us, he has accepted a position as clerk in the Second National Bank of that city.

Messrs. Walter Hershman and Jas. Hardesty were in our town on Sunday morning.

Mrs. Sadie Smith was at Deer Park on business one day last week.

Mrs. Bertie Jackson and daughter and Miss May Carter were Oakland vis tors one day last week.

Mrs. Agnes Cassidy returned to Cumberland on Saturday after spending a week at this place the guest of Mrs. A. M. Jeffreys.

Several of our boys spent Memorial Day at Deer Park and carried off the prizes. Mr. Nathan Spiker came out second best on the foot race and as yet we have failed to hear Mr. Theo George who was taking an interesting part in the pillow fight.

Mr. Jacob Carter after completing repairs on the Wilson store building, has accepted a position with Boss Carpenter Wm. Sisk at the Beckman Mine.

Dr. Emerson, the well known dentist, formerly of Blaine, but for some time past located near Newbnrg, W. Va., came over for the 30th and is visiting friends in this locality.

Mr. Francis McRobie and wife returned home last week after visiting friends at Blaine for several days.

Mrs. Acy Day, who has been very ill for some time, we are glad to note is somewhat improved.

Mr. Isaac Wright was visiting friends in Keyser and Piedmont several days last week.

Mr John Rexrode, employed as carpenter at the Beckman mine spent Decoration Day at Deer Park. We understand John has some special interests in the vicinity of Eagle Rock. He is problooking after the eagles.

Mr. Jackson Harvey and wife, of Antioch, W. Va., were visitors at Mrs. Harvey's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Croston, last week.

Mrs. Mary Spiker was visiting friends in Guinea Hollow on Friday last.

Mr. Theopolus George, who has resided here the past year moved back on the farm of his father, Hon. A. F. George, last week. We were sorry to to have them leave us, as they were good and obliging neighbors but hope our loss will be Mutton Hollow's gain.

Mr. Abraham Garrett, our junk dealer, was at Deer Park on business Saturday last.

Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Friend entertainquite a number on Saturday evening in the way of a musical entertainment.

Mrs. A. I. Wilson, of Davis, W. Va., has been spending several days the guest of her uncle, Mr. Abraham Wilson.

Miss Blanche Cassidy, of Cumberland, came up on May 30th and is spending a few days here the guest of Miss Gertrude Jeffreys.

Dr. Lininger, formerly of Deer Park, but now located at Frostburg, came up one evening of last week en route for Lost Land Run for a few days' sport with the finny tribe. He remained until after the 30th and was umpire for the ball game at Deer Park on that day.

Mr. Geo. Bernard has moved on the farm of Mr. Thos. Harvey. Mr. Robt. Brooks occupying the place vacated by Mr. Bernard.

Mrs. Cora Warnick, of Bloomington, spent May 30th here the guest of her sister-in-law, Mrs. A. M. Jeffreys.

Mrs. Hannah Rexrode was visiting her son Albert at Deer Park May 30th.

Master Dorsey Jeffreys is visiting relatives at Bloomington this week.

Mrs. Maggie Shepherd, of Ridgeleyville, W. Va., is visiting her brother, Mr. Jacob Carter, at this writing.

Mr. Tug Decost, of Arnold, W. Va. is spending a few days with his brother-in-law, Mr. Israel Moore.

Mr. George Tasker, who resides near Keyser, W. Va., was visiting his father, Mr. Hiram Tasker, over Sunday.

Mr. Jas. Spiker, of Piedmont, was in our town on Monday looking after his property at this place with expectations of making some repairs.

We are glad to note our road supervisors, Messrs. Allen Wright and Alf. McRobie with a force of men have commenced repairs to our county roads which are badly needed.

Mr. Richy Roy made his usual trip to Oakland Sunday.

Merchant Thos. E. Nine, of Swanton, was in our village a few hours on Sunday.

Miller and Saucer have erected a new saw mill on the Tom Harvey tract purchased by the Ravenscroft Lumber Co., and expect to make large shipments from this place in the near future. We understand it is estimated they will have from one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand feet to cut.

Owing to the extreme cold and wet weather some of our farmers are expecting to have to sow their corn ground in buckwheat.

BALTIMORE DAY AT JAMESTOWN

Extensive Preparations To Make June 27 A Day of Great Success.

Baltimore Day at the Jamestown Exposition, June 27, will be one of the important dates of the season, and the Baltimore-Jamestown Commission, appointed to have charge of the building and the event, promises a day worth while to those who attend. The Governor, Mayor of Baltimore and Maryland's Senators and Congressman will be among the distinguished guests invited by the commission, and every mayor of every city, town and village of Maryland will be invited. The day is regarded and not only as Baltimore Day, but as a day of celebration for the whole State of Maryland and all the southern territory which is so peculiarly bound to Baltimore by commercial relations.

That the Exposition will be in fine shape by June 27 is certain. An official statement has been issued by President St. George Tucker of the exposition company, to that effect. The Baltimore and Maryland buildings have both long been completed, and the Baltimore Building is a model of beauty in design and finish. It has fourteen finely finished rooms, protected by compo board over which exquisite design wall papers have been placed. Every room is handsomely furnished, and the big foyer room, with its cheerful open grate and genuine Maryland atmosphere, is an ideal place of comfort for social mingling. It will be the scenes of many a gathering of Baltimoreans and their friends at the Exposition.

The programme for Maryland Day has not been fully completed, but it will include adequate arrangements for music, and a semi-military feature will be added by the land and water divisions of the Maryland National Guard. There will, of course, be a list of speeches, and the orators will include men famous in this section of the southland. The exposition management will turn the fair over to Baltimore, liberally, and every facility will be provided for seeing everything in the best possible way.

Transportation facilities from Baltimore to the landing at Jamestown, and to Norfolk, Old Point, Newport News and the surrounding points from which the exposition can be reached by ferry, will be adequate. Hundreds are expected to go to Cape Charles and take the ferry over, and many will come up from Richmond to join their friends from Baltimore. All the local means of transportation will be used by those living in the counties, both by rail and water. The prospect now is that the attendance of Marylanders not living in Baltimore will be heavy, and while the figures may be larger, the members of the commission are hoping that there will be not less than 30,000 on the grounds on June 27, who are attracted directly by the interest in Baltimore Day.

To those who attend the exposition on this day there will be keen interest in the display of resources, natural and developed, in the Maryland section of the States Building. Many Baltimore firms are represented as well as industries outside of Baltimore.

The Baltimore-Jamestown Commission is asking suggestions for a slogan for the day, and hundreds of responses have been received. The slogan will probably be used in the form of ribbon streamers from buttons of the State colors, to be worn on the coat lapel. Both the Travelers and Merchants' and Merchants and Manufacturers' Associations will send excursions, and all the other community organizations are working up local interest. The commission is urging all who can do so to go a few days before the date set aside for Baltimore, in order to avoid the rush at the last.

PICTURESQUE SCENERY.

Oakland and Confluence Railroad Traverses Rugged Mountains and Gorges.

The Pittsburg Gazette Times of May 13th contained the following article descriptive of the route of the Oakland and Confluence railroad through this section:

"The announcement of the negotiations pending between the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and the Kendall Lumber Company looking toward the former's purchase of the Manor Lands and Oakland railroad, running from Kendall (formerly called Manor Lands and subsequently Krug), Garrett county, Md., to the crest of the Allegheny mountains, brings to light forthcoming development of one of the most unique little railroads winding about and through what is, doubtless, the most picturesque section of mountain territory in South Central Pennsylvania, Western Maryland or Northern West Virginia.

The county is rough and rugged in the extreme and for wonderfully attractive natural beauty it more than doubly discounts the very attractive views surrounding Indian Creek, Bailey's Point, Bear Run, Ohio Pyle and the rugged country to the east of Brook tunnel, past Fort Hill, Shoo Fly, and onto Markelton. When this latter territory partly along the Youghiogheny and the Casselman rivers was opened up in the early seventies it was to the amazement of all travelers who saw it in its primeval beauty. If the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company or private capital neglects to set aside two large blocks of land in the vicinity of White Rock and farther south at Swallow Falls and Muddy Creek Falls for park purposes it will be nothing short of a positive crime of commission and not omission.

The Manor Land and Oakland railroad is a narrow guage line with scarcely two rails of the same weight. It is laid with everything from what was once new 15-pounds-to-the-yard rails up to old-style seventies or eighties. The road, of course, never engaged in general transportation, and has no passenger or freight traffic beyond the log trains and the few mountaineers who take their life in their hands when they come down the line astride a logging truck. The motive power department consists of four Climax locomotives, built at Corry, Pa. Underneath these engines are a mass of cog wheels. To ordinary folk they are most peculiar and are worth a story in themselves.

This curious little road begins at Kendall, 20 miles south of Confluence, Pa., and extends due south for 13 miles to Browning's saw mill at Swallow Falls, Md. From the latter point there is a branch eastward well up on the top or the western slope of the Allegany mountain. It follows Deep Creek for five or six miles so that the line is really about 19 miles long.

Scarcely three miles south of Kendall after traversing as rocky and picturesque a gorge as there is in the Allegheny mountains, the narrow guage jumps across the Youghiogheny river at a most wonderful scenic point. Down through a narrow canyon for three milesonward and northward rushes the river, jumping, leaping, seething and boiling; pools and cascades, one after the other in fantastic profusion and confusion, the water ever clear, sometimes green and sometimes blue.

One-forth mile up stream from the little steel bridge is White Rock, a small tributary that rushed down the mountain side from the divide over to the west by the Preston county, W. Va., line. In less than a mile this stream—half the width of Fifth avenue—tumbles down probably 500 or 600 feet. The Farmers Bank building is 312 feet from curb to cornice, so you see that is going down some.

Standing on the rock wall promontories near the mouth of White Rock and looking down into the valley below, one may readily fancy himself a pioneer. If you can but forget the busy city miles away or your distant home town an impulse to hunt Indians would be most natural, so rough and rugged is Garrett county at this point.

Gradually for the next two miles, past Gap run, the valley widens slightly and becomes more peaceful. Then from the mouth of Salt Block run where the baby road spans the Youghiogheny a second time, and for five miles on up stream past the peaceful home of Milt Lytle and Alvin Friend's place on the nearby ridge top, Sang Run and on to Hoyes the country is more open, but decidedly mountainous, though not particularly rough or rocky.

Beginning almost abruptly and right at Hoyes the main water course narrows once again. One-half mile farther on Muddy Creek Junction is reached, and there looms up a mountain gorge that almost defies description. It is nearly three miles long, leading well up to the general level of the Garrett county glades on the top of the Allegheny mountains. Talk about the rocky slopes. At this point the mountain spurs are little else than nature's masonry covered with huge loose rocks, boulders and stones. Very many are bigger than the average two-story six or seven room frame house. One wonders where all this rock came from.

The feats on the ground and lofty tumbling that the rattlesnakes must need do to gain a foothold will put the acrobat of the greatest show on earth to the bad and make them look like amateurs. "Doc" Shank, formerly superintendent of the M. L. & O., and more recently at Crellin, once said that he "reckoned about the only way a snake could hold fast would be for him to grab his tail in his mouth after he'd looped himself fast to somethin," and the writer "allowed" it was so.

From Muddy Creek Junction the little Kendell road branches, going up both sides of the Youghiogheny river on grades approximately 11 per cent of 600 feet to the mile. Here's where the funny-geared locomotives, with their clanking and rattling cog wheels, get busy. They snort, puff and fuss around like some cantankerous backwoodsman who "by heck" ain't goin' to stand it.

In this most remarkable gorge, with its endless array of perpendicular rock walls, massive boulders and huge rock sections that ages ago fell from the cliffs overhead, the narrow gauge wends it way to the top of the mountain. One mile below Swallow Falls, Deep Creek roars down a rocky cascade in magnificent fashion, swelling the river below. A few hundred yards above, along the opposite shore and coming to join the main water course, is Muddy Creek. This good-sized creek, larger than White Rock, just before it enters the valley below makes a sheer drop of 57 feet. The sight from the opposite bank of the Youghiogheny, as one gazes through the branches of the pine trees, taking a full front view of the falls is most charming. But a short distance up the main stream is Swallow Falls, seven to eight miles from Oakland.

Nature designed this waterfall in two separate sections—one below the other. Close at hand is a loose rock formation, an island in fact, cut into existence by the rush of water around it. Its sides are probably 50 feet high. It is topped off by a couple of trees. The whole thing is lop-side to an alarming degree. Time and again has the writer stood at a distance wondering whether or not the blamed thing would not tumble into the water but year after year, like some of the strange formations in the Yosemite valley, it is always there when one returns for another look.

The branch of the M. L. & O. leading up the west bank of the Youghiogheny from Muddy Creek Junction, after tremendous labor, finally mounts to the top of the mountain spur and over quite level country runs westward for about six miles to the Lewis trout dam. There is also a very picturesque branch road climbing up White Rock run to the summit. Here a ten per cent grade is employed. Incidentally, the point derives its name from the very light color of the adjacent rocks. There is still another branch running up Hoyes run. This was opened last summer.

Much of the timber has been taken out. However, large quantities remain—some being too great difficult of access and is therefore the cost too great to warrant its removal, and again some is not for sale. All told the M. L. & O embraces 33 miles of lines.

The entire country is most charming; is rich historically—that is, if one likes quaint things, and is worth a volume. It is a really delightful place to spend the summer."

Chief Judge Boyd sat on the bench with Judge Henderson Wednesday.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK STUDENTS CONFERENCE

Program for Gathering of Bible Students to Be Held This Month.

With its Jubilee year Mountain Lake Park offers a new factor in the upbuilding of His Kingdom to be known as the Mountain Lake Park Students Conference which will be for all students of the bible and others interested.

The purposes of the Conference is to deepen the spiritual life of all who attend, to quicken a deeper interest in Missions, and to send forth an army of the Lord's own fully equipped for aggressive work for Christ.

The Platform for 1907 will consist of Dr. Harris E. Kirk, of Baltimore, who will give daily explanations of the Word; Dr. S. C. Sweet, of China, a Baptist Missionary having great success in this wonderful mission field, will speak daily on China, thus giving all mission student class members an opportunity to get a forecast of next year's work; Dr. Charles Roads one of the leading Sunday School workers of the country and Superintendent for the State of Maryland, will speak daily to the Sunday School workers. Besides these Rev. Dr. Wedderspoon of Pittsburg, Rev. T. E. Cramblet, President of Bethany College, Hon. Joshua Levering, Rev. Dr. W. L. Davidson of Chautauqua fame, and others of summit ability will be heard during the Conference.

Pastors, Sunday School workers, members of Mission Study Classes, Young People's Societies, Students in Colleges, Academies, Normal or High Schools will find in this conference a rare opportunity for the study of Him and His.

Saturday, June 22, a Reception by the Executive Committee to all residents of the Park and vicinity, all members and others interested will open the Conference. Sunday, June 23, will bring a rich treat in sermons by Drs. Sweet and Davidson. The afternoon will be a Recognition Service for all those who who have entered the Kingdom within the past year.

Beginning with Monday, June 24, and continuing until Saturday, June 29, Dr. Kirk, one of the most attractive expounders of the Word; Dr. Sweet, eminently qualified to tell the Story of China and its people, and Dr. Charles Roads, the Sunday School Specialist, will speak daily to all Christian workers present.

More than 40 prominent educators or college presidents and many christian workers have consented to serve on the advisory board. The Registration Fee for the entire Conference will be the nominal amount of $1.00, or less than three (3) cent for every address.

Patent for Saw Dust Blower.

Messrs. E. G. Naylor and George Kerins, of Oakland, have applied through their attorneys for a patent on a blower which is intended to convey saw dust and other offall from a saw mill. The originators of the device have already made a number of these machines and have disposed of them at a handsome profit. They have received from one of the largest manufacturers of saw mills an offer for the purchase of their patent.

Mr. Ulysses Frazee, of near Selbysport was in Oakland Saturday and Sunday visiting his nephew, Mr. A. Totten Mathews.

MR. PROCTER'S SECOND LETTER FROM CALIFORNIA.

He Tells of Pasadena, The Beautiful, and It's Surroundings.

MR. THOMAS J. PEDDICORD,

Dear Sir:—Pasadena, about ten miles northeast of Los Angeles, is the most beautiful city in southern California, and has few equals in the whole world. For a background there are Sierra Madre mountains a few miles away, and the Pacific ocean about twenty-five miles to the west, is visible from heights near the city. The valuable land surrounding the city is highly cultivated, orange and walnut trees prevailing, though many acres are devoted to grape vines. Pasadena is divided into two residence parts by the business section, which is comparatively small because of the proximity of the large city of Los Angeles, and there are no corner stores outside of the shopping district. The principal streets are paved with asphalt and the side streets are tamped and oiled. All gutters and curbs are of asphalt, which is a California product, and every sidewalk, even on the smallest streets, is made of asphalt, with a strip of green grass and a row of trees, pepper trees or palms, between walk and curb. No lot is less than fifty feet front and every residence stands back at least fifty feet from walk, with no fence or sign of division, unless it be a line of rose trees, geraniums or cherokee roses. Hardly a yard but in it is at least one orange tree, now (March) yellow with its golden fruit, with here and there some on the ground, as apples in a Garrett county orchard in October.

Many families, especially those living away from the center of Pasadena, keep chickens in back yards, but because of the damage they might do to flowers, fruits and vegetables, the owners are obliged to surround them with high fences of wire mesh. The general effect of Pasadena is that of a prosperous suburb of a large Eastern metropolis. The city is trying to have all telephone and telegraph poles removed from the streets, as being unsightly, which they certainly are. One telephone company already has its wires in underground conduits. Until poles can be removed they are required to be painted green so as to be less conspicuous among the green trees.

Pasadena is the headquarters for Eastern tourists in southern California. All points of nearby interest can be reached by cars of the excellent electric system, at the head of which is Mr. H. E. Huntington, nephew of the late Collis P. Huntington, one of the builders of the Southern Pacific railroad. Cars run every few minutes into Los Angeles. By an arrangement of trasfer tickets one can ride for a single fare from Pasadena to Alhambra, Monrovia, "Lucky" Baldwin's Ranch, San Gabriel Mission, Sierra Madre and Mt. Lome. The latter rises to a height of about six thousand feet a few miles north of Pasadena. A trolly line runs into the foot hills through Rube's canyon. There an incline plane carries a cable car up a thousand feet. From here to the top another trolly car goes over a track built on a roadway that winds up the mountain side until the summit is reached, the climb from the top of the incline occupying an hour's time. There is a small hotel at the terminus of the trolly line, where many people take luncheon, and not a few pass the night to get sunset, sunrise and moonlight views. One can see not only the Pacific ocean, but also the three islands off Santa Barbara, about one hundred miles away. From Los Angeles the cars of the Huntington system extend to and along the Pacific coast. In one of them the writer went from Pasadena to Hollywood, where the residence of Paul de Lougpie, the celebrated painter of flowers was visited, to Sawtelle, location of a National Soldiers' Home, to Santa Monico, where one reaches the Pacific ocean for the first time, to Venice, a seaside town built by millionaire Abbot Kinney, of the Kinney Tobacco Company, in which are canals, bridges, theatre, a midway plaisance, open air amphitheatre, a tent city for summer cottagers, a hotel on a ship, bank, postoffice, shops, and beautiful bungalows, the permanent homes of intelligent, well-to-do people, to Ocean City and Kedondo, seaside resorts for Los Angelos citizens in the summer, to the Palms, a beautiful town midway between Los Angeles, a distance of fifty miles in all. The return trip from Los Angeles to Pasadena was especially memorable. As the car went up the grade the whole landscape was bathed in the light of the setting sun. Ahead the full moon appeared. On either side of the track acres of orange trees, full of flowers and fruit, stretched out for miles, surrounding the handsome homes of their owners, embowered in roses, and in the background of this otherwise semi-tropical scene, were the massive grey mountains, capped with snow.

Los Angeles had a population of about 100,000 in 1900, San Francisco, 340,000, and Seattle, 80,000, these three being the largest cities on the Pacific coast. In the last seven years Los Angeles and Seattle have grown at the expense of San Francisco, the population of the the three cities being as follows: Los Angeles, 200,000, San Francisco, 375,000, and Seattle, 180,000. Los Angeles bids fair to outstrip San Francisco, and Seattle promises to become the largest city on the Pacific coast. The first named city is twenty-two miles from the ocean, but has acquired a strip of land extending to San Pedro, where, with government aid, a harbor capable of receiving vessels drawing twenty-feet of water, can be admitted. This is the the only good harbor betweed San Francisco and San Diego, a distance of six hundred miles. Aside from its favorable location, Los Angeles owes its rapid growth largely to favoritism of the Southern Pacific and Santa Fe railroad systems, and at the expense of San Diego, Santa Barbara and other towns. The former of these roads, starting at New Orleans, La., approaches Los Angeles from the south. The latter runs southwest diagonally from Chicago and crosses the Sierra Nevada mountains by the one practicable pass, Cajon Pass. United States Senator Clark built a road from Salt Lake, Utah, to Los Angeles and San Pedro, intending to compete with the Southern Pacific and Santa Fe, but Mr. E. H. Harriman, president of the Southern Pacific, which owns and controls all land and water transportation of California compelled him to make a traffic arrangement that destroyed competition. President Roosevelt is nowhere more popular than he is on this Pacific coast, because of his endeavor to force railroads to deal justly with all communities and individual shippers. Not only is transportation controlled by the Southern Pacific railroad, but state and municipal governments as well. The former governor, a most excellent man, permitted the Western Pacific, a railroad projected from Salt Lake, Utah, to San Francisco, by George Gould of the Wabash, Western Maryland and other roads, to secure an entrance into the California metropolis, against the interests and wishes of the Southern Pacific, and he was not renominated. The expensiveness of everything in southern California, because of lack of competition in transportation, will be told in another letter.

Yours truly,

PERCY PROCTER.

Married.

JONES—HOOK.—There was a very pretty wedding at the home of Mr. and Mrs. E. B Hook on Sunday evening, June 2nd, at 8 o'clock, when their handsome and accomplished daughter Miss Edna Grace was united in the holy bonds of matrimony to Mr. Roy Jones, of Centerville, Washington county, Pa., a nephew of Mr. J. C. Kendall, of the Kendall Lumber Company of Garrett county. Promptly at 8 P. M. they marched into the parlor to the strain of Christian March, played by Mrs. Dr. A. J. Mason, when Rev. A. L. Donachy, of the Baptist church, made them man and wife. The bride was dressed in white silk and slippers. The groom wore a suit of gray. Miss Minnie Rush, of Holly, was maid of honor. Mr. Quinter Hook, the bride's brother, was best man. After the ceremony all went to the spacious dining room and partook of one of the most elaborate wedding suppers that it has been our privilege to enjoy. Those present besides the immediate family were: Dr. and Mrs. A. J. Mason, Mr. J. C. Jones and daughter, the groom's father and sister, of Centerville, Pa., 'Squire and Mrs. L. Hardie, Mr. J. C. Kendall, of Kendall, Md., Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Loaraw and children, Mr. and Mrs. S. T. Bowling, Mr. and Mrs. George Frazee, Mr. and Mrs. Orvill Welch, Mr. and Mrs. Noah Frazee, Miss Joy Frazee, Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Myers, Mrs. George Vansickel, Mr. D. H. Friend, Mr. Lou Vansickel, and Mr. Harland Friend. The presents that the bride received were many and beautiful as well as useful, consisting of a pretty gold watch from her father and mother, silverware, table linen and many other useful articles too numerous to mention. At a late hour, all feeling that an evening of pleasure had been enjoyed, all wished the bride and groom peace, happiness and long and useful lives through the sea of matrimonial bliss. May their joys be many, their sorrows few.

JOHN BROWN GUILTY OF MANSLAUGHTER.

Sentenced to Serve Eight Years In Maryland Penitentiary—Other Court News.

The case of John Brown, indicted for the murder of Truman Root, which occurred on the night of February 14th, at the home of Oscar Friend, near Friendsville, where both men had gone on their way home from Friendsville, was taken up in the Circuit Court on Tuesday morning of this week before Judges Boyd and Henderson, who sat as a jury in the case.

For the State there was eight witnesses and for the defense seventeen were examined. The testimony showing that both Root and Brown were in a state of intoxication and that they became involved in a quarrel while in the Friend house, terminating in a fight in which Brown stabbed Root to death with a knife, the fatal injury being a thrust with the weapon which entered and severed the jugular vein, producing death within a very few minutes thereafter.

The first witness examined by the state was Mrs. Friend, who stated that she is twenty-four years of age; that she was married at 14 and is the mother of three children; her husband is now confined in an asylum for the insane. She stated that while she was in an adjoining room the murder was committed; that she did not see the fight between the men. She was corroborated in her testimony by her little daughter.

The other witness for the State gave testimony of a circumstantial nature; how the body of Root was found lying upon a bed; the condition of his clothing and the lack of evidence about the room that a fight had taken place therein.

For the defence Brown was placed on the stand and stated that Root had assaulted him by stricking him in the face and from that moment everything that transpired was a blank; that he had no recollection of having cut Root and that he was unaware that a crime had been committed until the following morning when he was placed under arrest by the State's officials.

The testimony of nearly all the witnesses was of such a nature as to exclude it from public print and therefore this paper cannot go into the details.

The case was concluded yesterday afternoon and this morning Judge Henderson, who appeared alone upon the bench, Judge Boyd having returned to Cumberland last night, rendered the verdict of the Court sitting as a jury. Judge Henderson said:

"There is no doubt in the mind of the Court that the killing of Truman Root was done by John Brown. All the testimony in the case tended to prove this fact. The next question under consideration by the Court was the grade of the crime. It is felt by the Court that it was not up to the first degree, or murder; therefore it was either in the second degree or manslaughter. The Court is ready to render a verdict of guilty of manslaughter and not of murder in the first degree. There is a presumption of doubt as to just why and how the crime was committed, so we give the benefit of the doubt to the prisoner. Intemperate use of intoxicating liquors was undoubtedly the cause of the crime. It is a pity 'that men put that into their stomachs that steals away their brains.'

"John Brown may consider himself lucky that he is convticed of no greater degree of crime and the sentence of the Court is that he be confined for a period of eight years in the Maryland Penitentiary."

Brown took his sentance composedly. His wife, who was in the court room at the time, was seemingly the more affected of the two. She occupied a seat in the rear of the room. Her whole frame was convulsed with emotion, but she bore up bravely and left the court room in advance of others who were less interested in the fate of the prisoner.

In the case of Jasper Myers, a school teacher, who was fined by Justice Hardie, of Friendsville, for punishing a pupil too severely, Judge Henderson affirmed the decision of the Justice with costs.

Since our last report the following cases have been disposed of by trial or otherwise:

No. 10 Albert J. Beckman vs. Isaac C. Woodford, trading as The Century Supply Co.; continued for cause on motion of appellant. Hamill—Peddicord.

No. 11. Marion C. Hoye, trading as John Shartzer & Co., vs. The Uniontown Grocery Co.; appeal from a Justice who gave judgment for appellee; trial before the Court and verdict for appellee for $99.25.

No. 13. Lloyd Dean vs. George W. Long; appeal from Justice Hardie; continued for cause. Hamill—Peddicord.

No. 14. Lloyd Dean vs. George R. Long; appeal from Justice Hardie; continued for cause. Hamill—Peddicord.

No. 15. John A. Sowers vs. H. L. Ferguson; appeal dismissed.

No. 16. John Shartzer & Co. vs. Matthews & Hamill; appeal from Justice Gonder; suit on premiums earned on an insurance policy which was cancelled; tried before the Court and verdict for appellees for full amount claimed, $14.01. Mr. Shartzer conducted his own case. Peddicord for Matthews & Hamill.

TRIAL DOCKET.

No. 1. Joseph T. Osborn vs. Elijah Livengood; ejectment; rule laid upon county surveyor to return the warrant of resurvey, and case continued. Sincell and Thayer—Semmes and Mitchell.

No. 2. Truman F. Root vs. The Bear Creek Lumber Co.; continued. Williams—Peddicord.

PENITENTIARY LIFE DESCRIBED

Does a Term in Prison Make the Average Man Better or Worse.

Nothing that might be written of life in the Maryland Penitentiary would be complete without a word or two as to the man who holds the reins, Mr. John F. Weyler, the warden. One is interwoven with the other; each one is so incorporated in the other that it is difficult to conceive of the one without the other. Warden Weyler is a man who has always taken his profession seriously. He is the linchpin of the whole machine here, and he knows it. He is the brains of the institution.

Warden Weyler will be long and favorably remembered by the Marylanders for his good work in connection with the penitentiary. He is the indispensable man, who toils wearilessly at the laboring oar; one who rises with the lark. He does not play at business, for he is a man of business, who sticks to business, and who, it is to be hoped for the good of all concerned, will continue to carry on business at the old stand for some time to come. A heavy burden no doubt, but "the burden that is well borne becomes light."

It is not necessary for one to come in direct contact with Warden Weyler to form a judgment of him. His system here inaugurated solely by him and maintained by him, speaks for itself. It is part of himself, for he has devoted a large portion of life to it and has concentrated his best efforts to its accomplishment. He is cool, cold, stern, cautious, reserved in speech, not effusive, a veritable Sphinx at times, and still one whose hand and mind are felt in every revolution of every official wheel of penitentiary life.

It might be pertinent to inquire what relation exists between warden and prisoner for the whole welfare of the prisoner's life for the time being revolves round that of the warden. We ourselves know him and have a genuine respect for him, fully realizing that we can rely on him at all times for counsel, guidance, support and encouragement. There is one sure thing, too, that can be said for our peace of mind, and that is that we may rest assured that we all will receive equally fair treatment while under the jurisdiction of the present warden. We are in prison, the past is gone from us forever, the futue we cannot reach, the present alone is ours; and so, if we have any common sense whatever, we understand fully that there are certain restrictions by which we must regulate our conduct and general mode of deportment. Things are not likely to be just as we might wish them to be; this is a self-evident fact. For if they were so there are some men who would like to make the penitentiary their permanent abode. Therefore, it is that all of us feel the effect of Warden Weyler's benign system of management, and we know that, despite his characteristics, deep down beneath the exterior the man is there, ready to respond to all our reasonable requests and to right promptly and decisively any injustice. We all possess the right to confer with him personally and can unreservedly place before him our troubles and difficulties, with the assurance of receiving the most considerate attention from him. One of the warden's rules, and one greatly appreciated by the men here, is that there shall be no intermediary between himself and those in his charge whenever occasion warrants. With all his other duties, he sets apart daily an hour or so to seeing those men who wish to confer with him. It may be only a trivial matter, but looming large to the applicant, or vice versa; still all receive the same unfailing courteous treatment, combined with the good advice and encouragement. After such an interveiw with Warden Weyler many a one here, cast down and in trouble, has taken a brighter view of things.

There is also another period of the day which he sets apart for our welfare, but when none of us wish to renew his acquaintance. This is when he holds court and hears charges made by officers against those of us of any infraction of the rules. 'Tis there in the court-room, termed central office, that the delinquent slowly wends his way in charge of the officer making the complaint against him. There is no star-chamber proceeding here no railroading to punishment. The officer states his charge and the accused is given an impartial hearing—in fact the leaning is all in favor of the delinquent, for punishment only follows very flagrant cases or repeated infractions of the rules, It is useless for men to lie to the Warden, for his intuition is keen and he sees through such pervarication, and then woe betide the offender. An avowal of the offense on the part of the culprit may save him from anything worse than a "tongue-lashing" but don't think for a moment that you can pull the the wool over the eyes of your Uncle John. Though he may let you off once, twice or maybe a third time, beware of the fate of pitcher that went to the well too often. Punishment, if any at all is inflicted, generally consists of loss of privileges or a partial loss of good time, although this can be and is frequently regained by subsequent good conduct. However most of us consider a "tonguelashing" by the Warden a severe punishment enough for he flays us unmercifully in this manner if he considers we deserve it. Now, no longer reticent or icy in manner, he rises in his wrath to the full height of his six feet and then some, and flinging his arms about (a characteristic action), the words of censure follow one another swift, prompt, sharp, short and cutting, like the shot from a Gatling gun. Once such a session before "Judge" Weyler generally lasts the average man for the balance of his term although many men go through their sentences, long or short without ever being brought up on charges. A little thinking on one's part, a full realization of one's position, will obliterate all necessity of it.

For the younger men under his charge the warden seems to have a peculiar interest. Maybe it is because there is more ground to to work on for reformation. I think this is so; he recognizes that the weakest among us has a gift, and does not care what a man has been, but what he has become. At all events no man is over taxed; a proper, judicious consideration is given to each individual case, both by Warden and doctor for either mental deficiencies or otherwise, so as to make a proper assignment suitable to the man's condition and capabilities. Very few mistakes are made in this direction for all assignments are followed up personally by the Warden who keeps in close touch with the man to see that he is started aright. As all assignments are made with a view to the adaptability of the prisoner to the particular branch of the work to which he is sent so also are all tasks, as fixed by the Warden, based in an absolutely fair manner, with due consideration to the rights of the contractor, and at the same time he never loses sight of the interests of the prisoners, assuring to them as an encouragement to industry an opportunity to earn money for themselves by their labor.

We have talked about the relation existing between Warden and prisoner. How is it between officer and prisoner? While the Warden hand is felt over all, both officers and men alike, we ourselves come in direct contact with the officers daily, as they are with us from the time we troop out in the morning to breakfast, are with us in the shops all day long, and continue in charge until once again we are back in our room in the evening. As an officer is usually assigned to a certain shop or foundry, as may be, and as he stays there for some lengthy period, he generally becomes well acquainted with his men and they likewise grow to know and understand their officer. There is established in most shops a good feeling between men and officers, particularly so as the officer becomes familiar with the idiosyncracies, temperament and individual peculiarities of the men under his supervision. Good judgment is a requisite here and is invariably shown.

As has been stated a feeling of confidence is established between officer and prisoner barring the disturbing element, which sometimes though seldom, comes to the front and becomes obstreperous. There is, of course, the cantankerous and contumacious prisoner here, and while much patience and forbearance is exhibited toward him, still there are times when it is absolutely necessary to squelch him and give him "what's coming to him." Then, of course, it becomes a case for "Judge" Weyler, who knows just how to handle such men. While patience and forbearance are well in their way and while they are generally worn threadbare before any action is taken involving the disciplining of a man, it has to be borne in mind that the penitentiary is neither a kindergarten nor a ladies' seminary and that all such disturbers have to be handled as suits the extigency of the case.

No man need leave the institution stranded; should he have expended all his money, maybe for his home folks, or should he not have any money to his credit, the institution will provide necessary funds to take him back to his home. The inmates at all times stand ready and willing to "chip in" toward a purse for any deserving man who leaves here temporarily embarrassed, and we regard it as a privilege to be permitted to assist in a case of this kind.

Men leave here with a respect for law, order and justice. There is no bitter feeling no sense of outraged manhood, only a deep resolve to profit by the lesson incalculated here. One man on leaving—an old, habitual criminal, who had "done time" in prisons all over the country and who had just completed a nine-year sentence here—is on record as stating that more men left the Maryland Penitentiary with a firm revolve to do right and well equipped to do so than to his knowledge, left any other prison.

While a small percentage of men in prison become apathetic and lose all interest in life, the majority of prisoners do not allow their present condition to depress them to too great an extent. If they are sensible and think at all, they must not do so. We do not permit our present surroundings to overwhelm us or to influence our minds or actions to the detriment of our well-being.

Somewhat surprising, too is it how one becomes used to one's environments. People outside naturally shudder at the idea of being in prison confined behind the bars of a prison cell. Rightly so too, for it is far from being the purpose to advocate the pleasures of the same, but it is curious from a psychological point of view to search onerelf for one's impressions as to this condition.

On first viewing the cell that is to be one's dwelling place for a number of years one is depressed and somewhat disheartened at the thought of being confined therein for any length of time. But that is only at first; gradually, strange to say, all feeling of dread of the barred door and of the cell inclosure itself passes away, as one becomes accustomed more and more to one's surroundings. As Byron says in the "Prisoner of Chilton:"

My very chains and I grew friends,
So much a long communion tends
To take us what we are. Even I
Regained my freedom with a sigh.

So here by degrees, one furnishes up his little room (we do not call them cell, by the way); a small table, rocking chair, carpet, clock, mirror, photographs of our loved ones, together with a few books and magazines, form a general ensemble that go to make up a sleeping apartment which will compare favorably and even luxuriously with the conditions under which some of the occupants labored on the outside. Everything is comparative. If you have not saen he the best, it is easy to content with something else. However, I would beg that none of my readers get a wrong impression here. I do not advise them, most emphatically not, to attempt to break into the penitentiary to obtain these luxries.

Some theorists might try to form a hypothesis from this peculiar feeling and adaptability to one's surroundings here and attribute it it to an evidence of a naturally depraved or low nature but it would not be right to do so. For while with a few men this might be true, still with most men in prison this feeling of resignation must be attributed to habit which grows on a man as he stays there month after month and year after year, to force circumstances, combined with a passive acceptance of existing conditions. Kismet!

There are many more phases of life here that might be dwelt upon, but we have already imposed upon the good nature of our editor. Just one more illustration and we are done.

We have shown I think, conclusively what is accomplished for the wellbeing of the prisoner, bodily, morally, mentally and physically. What does the State do for his spiritual welfare? Nothing is left undone in this direction either. With a resident chaplain, a man of big heart, thoroughly imbued with the spirit of his calling, accessible at all times, and with one or more of the good priests from Loyala College, the good work is carried on. Sunday is a day of complete rest with us; from early mass and separate Sunday school sessions to the general church meeting in the afternoon for all of us together, do chaplain and priest work shoulder to shoulder

Are our services impressive? Do they do any good? Come up once to our chapel under the doctrine; come and judge for your self. Impressive! yes. Nearly one thousand men assembled, listening intenly to a touching and earnest discourse or singing a favorite hymn, led by a trained choir and accompained by the massive new pipe organ.

We may not be a reilgious body of men as a whole though there are many earnest and sincere Christains among us; but one cannot but be impressed by the services. Probably the very fact of our being situated as we are adds to the solemnity of the occasion and makes one more susceptible to such feeling. But the exhortation of the preacher, the hope and promises held to all in His name, combined with the sublime tones of the organ as it thunders forth its "Gloria in Execlsis" or the ever-beautiful "Near My God to Thee," strikes a chord that vibrates and thrills like a magnetic current to the very center of one's being; and one goes forth from this mysterions influence, refreshed and chastened in spirit, back to one's room, with the theme of the preacher's discourse running through one's mind, and the thrill of the melody of the "Gloria" reverberating harmoniously and insistenly to the very depths of one's soul.

The very walls themselves hurl the message back to you. "Come unto Me"—it sticks—it stays with you—"all ye that labor"—you can't get away from it—"I will give you rest"—you can't shake it off—you can't—and so you listen and hearken for "the song that we hear with our ears is sung in our hearts," and you are ready to commence a new week, strengthened in heart and softened in spirit, well fortified, for the day's work.

One final word: The task is finished; it has been a pleasant one to dwell on the various phases of life here, not only a pleasure, but a duty, a duty to ourselves and a duty and pleasure combine to render to those here that which is their due. The writer will soon be hence, but as one among many he will carry with him nothing but the best of feelings for all connected with institutional life and particularly so for the man generally known as Warden Weyler, but who is known more closely to us as the "Boss," sometimes as "the old man," again as "Uncle John," but to whom I have applied the cognomen "the brains of the institution."

Does it fit? I leave that for you to say.

HARVEY P. BENNETT.

—In Baltimore Sun.

BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. Grant Harshbarger returned home on last Sunday morning from a very enjoyable visit to his sister Mrs. Sallie Matthews and her son Harvey, of Brownsville, Pa.

Mrs. Jacob Clark and children are visiting relatives in the valley of Virginia.

Booze comes high on the W. Va. R. R. Seven dollars and forty cents each is what it cost two young men to take a drink and exchange of sociabilities on a W. M. passenger car a few days ago. The passengers were bound for Elk Garden and as neither one objected and both thought it would do good, pulled the cork and passed the flask. Special officer Ott Davis happened to witness the transaction and took them in charge, with the result as stated above. The new law which prevents drinking and passing of the bottle on all steam and electaic cars on all W. Va. lines went into effect on May 1st.

During the all day rain of last Saturday, a big land slide covered up completely the mouth of the six foot opening of the Monroe Coal and Mining Co's property, at Barnum, and suspended operation in this vein until last Friday morning. Very little time was lost by the miners as a majority of them worked on the night and day shift in the removal of the mud and rock.

Messrs John Elliot and John Tibbets, two well known and popular young men of this city, started for Birmingham, Ala., on last Monday evening. Both young men have positions in view and in all probability will make that their home for some time to come.

Another land slide on the county road between this place and the top of Luke hill, has suspended traffic of all kinds for some time to come.

Mrs Charles Brendlin is visiting relatives in Blaine.

Mr. N.U. Bond, en route to Pittsburg, spent a few hours in town on Sunday. He was accompanied by his brother, Mr. John Bond, of Breckleyville, Pa., who had just closed a sale of two fine Percherons, to Garrett County stock raisers, for sum of of $2900. Mr. Bond owns one of the finest stock farms in the state of Pennsylvania and gives especial attention to large draft horses of the Percheron strain.

Garrett county has settled matters politically and we suppose the holding of conventions this fall will be a mere matter of form as Col. A. G. Sturgiss, of Oakland, has blazed the way, not only for the State, but the Nation as well. He enthusisastically endorses Mr. Roosevelt for president and Col. Pearre for Governor, and has become so warm over the matter the thermometer has taken a jump up into the spring figures in Oakland and the people out there are planting onions and lettuce. The friends of Col. Pearre in this place, think it would be a "step backward" for him to accept the nomination for Governor. He should be our next U. S. Senator.

It is reported that high license will be the cry of the Anti-Saloon League in Garrett county this fall. The figures for retail dealers license run all the way from three to six hundred dollars per annum, according to different reports. If this turns out to be true, the price of liquid refreshments will be up and we will necessarilly be compelled to spend some time on the water wagon.

ORIGIN OF THE WORD "HOOSIER"

And Its Application to the Residents of the State of Indiana.

Jacob P. Dunn has turned his historical searchlight on the question of the origin of the word "Hoosier," says the Indianapolis News, and in an interesting paper read before the Indiana historical society (and just published by the society), thoroughly exhausts the theme. Nearly all of the theories that have been advanced on the subject, such as the "Who's here?" the "Husar," &c., have been fantastic and unsupported by substantial evidence or reason. Mr. Dunn very properly attaches no credence to any of them. After careful investigation and collection of early authorities, he concludes that the word was first put in print by John Finley in his poem, "The Hoosier's Nest," published January 1, 1833. This is probably true, though it may have been used with a local application in some southern papers before that. The evidence shows beyond doubt that the word is of old English origin and was in common use in the south to indicate a rough, uncouth countryman from any locality before it was applied distinctively to Indiana or its citizens. It probably was applied derisively to Indianians before Finley appropriated it and made it classic. The fact that it came into general use within less than a year after the publication of his verses indicates that it may already have become a distinctive appellation of Indiana when he wrote. Mr. Dunn presents several examples of its newspaper use as applied to Indiana within a year or so after the application of poem; but here is one he overlooked. Niles' Register of December 28, 1833, less than a year after the publication of the poem, said:

The Hoosier—A new paper with this title has lately commenced in Greencastle, Ind., by J. B. Ray, late governor of that state. The following account of the origin of the term which forms the somewhat eccentric title of the newspaper, and which is now in frequent use to designate the citizens of the state, we find in the Pittsburg Statesman: "Hoosier—the Hoosier State. The good citizens of our sister state of Indiana have been called Hoosiers for some time past at home and abroad, sometimes honorably and sometimes the reverse. As the term has become general it is high time that its origin and definition should be as generally known. Before that section of the public lands was regularly surveyed, many families located and were called squatters. The surveyors on finding one of these would ask, 'Who's here?' and place the name on their map. The question became familiar that on the exclamation of another 'Who's here?' became equally so until it eventuated in the general term of Hoosier."

The theory here presented as to the origin of the word Hoosier is fanciful and altogether improbable, but the publication of the article in Niles' Register (published at Baltimore) of December 28, 1833, copied from a Pittsburg paper of a previous date, shows that the word was already then in pretty general use. In fact, the article says, the words "is in frequent use" and that "citizens of Indiana have been called Hoosiers for some time past, at home and abroad."

This rather indicates that the word was specially attached to Indiana and her people before Finley used it. But the origin and etymology of the word remain as much a mystery as ever, except that it was in common use from an early day in some parts of the south to signify a rough or uncouth person. No matter where it originated or what it may have meant once, the people of Indiana have made it an honorable appellation.

MUNICIPALUNACY.

Edited by JOHN KENDRICK BANGS.

The citizens of New London, Mo., recently declared against municipal ownership by a vote of 160 to 2. Thus again do we find the people deprived of their rights by a corporation ridden majority.

We do not credit the report that New York intends to place its most accomplished bunko steerers in the pilot houses of the municipal ferry. It is more likely to get its helmsmen from the League of American Wheelmen.

An inquirer wants to know why a professor of Latin and Greek should not become a capable superintendent of a municipal cemetery. We see no good reason why he shouldn't, except that his familiarity with dead languages would be apt to put him on such chatty terms with his tenants that he would neglect his business.

A friend of ours has discovered that this talk about depreciation in street car lines is all tommyrot in so far as the crosstown lines are concerned anyhow. It is a well known fact, he says, that these lines never run down. They run across. We respectfully submit this argument to their honors the city fathers.

Without wishing to be at all invidious, we would call attention to the interesting acrostic furnished by the Municipal Ownership Bubble, which, strangely enough, signifies the ultimate ownership of public utilities under the municipal ownership idea. Try it and see:

Municipal Ownership
Bubble.

A Detroit alderman wants Detroit to go into the making of bricks. In a recent speech he declared that "we are in the grasp of the brick trust, when we could reduce prices 100 per cent if we could manufacture our own brick." It is a pity the learned gentleman could not have figured out a reduction of 110 per cent, for then Detroit could have made bricks not only for nothing, but coined a premium of 10 per cent as well. The free coinage of bricks would be an interesting economic diversion.

A request for the last annual report of the municipal electric light plant in a Michigan town of less than 2,000 inhabitants elicited from the manager the laconic reply, "About three thousand in the hole last year." The situation can be relieved, however, by the prompt action of the common council in passing an appropriation of $3,500 for the purpose of the hole on behalf of the park department, thus showing a profit of $500 on the books of the lighting commission.

The municipal pawnshop of Liege, Belgium, is not as popular as it was expected to be. The hope that being conducted for the people by the people to lend money as the collateral of the people a man could borrow $500 on $4.50 worth of jewelry has not been realized.

A French Telephone Experience.

The San Francisco Chronicle is responsible for the following item in regard to Nantes, France:

Some years ago there was a private telephone system which the paternal government took over. After some years' trial the government has just received a petition signed by 10,000 persons, each of whom pays at least $80 a year for telephone service, requesting that the telephone system be sold to some private company, because under a private company they got far better service, were treated with politeness instead of insolence and had complaints attended to instead of being ignored.

British Lighting Plants Sold.

By a vote of 41 to 2 the Bath city corporation has decided to sell the municipal lighting plant, which it purchased in 1896. As this had been run at a loss, even without allowing for depreciation, the sale will result in an immediate reduction of local taxes.

The Irish Independent states:

"The Bray urban council have decided to offer for sale their electric light works, which have been run at a very heavy loss, while the cost of public lighting was in excess of that of Dublin, although the lamps were only lighted for a third of the time they were in the metropolis."

The Dublin municipal plant, however, was run at a loss last year of over $20,000, irrespective of depreciation, which would have brought the loss up to $50,000.

A Losing Game.

The city council of England, Ark., has passed an ordinance leasing the municipal electric light and water plants for six years. An inquiry as to the cause of this action brought the following reply:

"The reason that the town wanted to lease these was because for it to operate them was a losing game, and it could not afford it."

The Telephone In Greece.

According to the United States consul at Athens, the telephone service in Greece is restricted, bad and a source of loss to the government. He believes that private enterprise, if well backed financially, could obtain a favorable concession from the Greek parliament on condition it undertook to install and work an efficient system.—Electrical Times.

WILL TEST THE ELECTION LAW.

Leaders of the Democratic party have agreed that it is advisable to have the courts pass upon the question whether or not the so-called legalized primary election law is applicable to the counties of Maryland as well as Baltimore city, and arrangements are new being made to have a test case brought before the courts. It is probable that this will be done in Carroll county and that Mr. B. Frank Crouse and Mr. Francis Neale Park will take the initiative.

It is understood that the legalized primary act does not apply to the election of delegates to the state conventions to the two parties. It is assumed that those counties which have special primary election laws—which are Montgomery, Allegany, Harford and Baltimore—are not affected. The other counties, according to Attorney General Bryan, are required to hold their primaries under the provisions of the legalized primary acts.

Mr. Parks will probably make a demand on the Supervisors of Elections in this county that the forthcoming primaries be conducted in accordance with the provisions of this law and they will decline to do so. Then Mr. Park will file a petition for a mandamus against the Supervisors alleging that it is their duty to hold the primary under the law and praying that a mandamus issue requiring them to do so. The Supervisors will demur to the petition, and on a hearing of this demurrer the court will pass on the whole question. The proceedings of course, will be wholly amicable.

The Democratic leaders are anxious to have this question passed upon, because in the event that party primaries are held and later the courts should be be asked to pass on the question and should declare that the law applied to the whole State all party nominees would have to be placed on the official ballot by nomination papers and possibly would have to use the word "independent" or some similar term before the designatian "Republican" or "Democrat."

Action in this matter will be taken at an early date, in order if possible to have the lower court pass on the matter in time to get a decision from the Court of Appeals, when it meets on June 24 if it should be thought advisable to take it there—Carroll County Enterprise

SIMPLY A GIGANTIC SCHEME.

It is doubtful if any human intellect is capable of fully appreciating the meaning of a hundred million dollars. The few persons who possess property, real or personal or both, worth that amount of money have but a meager idea of the significance of the fact. In these days the public is famliarized with huge figures but the miud is not expanded by the sight of them. Anybody can talk, for instance, of billions; but is there anybody whose mind really perceives what such figures stand for? How many lives of working men are coined into a billion dollars? Indeed take a million dollars, a thousand times one thousand, and you have a long procession of toilers melted down to make the showing. We are reminded of the size and power of millions of dollars by an editorial announcement in the New York Times that, "with impressive ceremonies near Peeksill, on June 20, work will be inaugurated on the greatest aqueduct of modern or ancient times. It will cost $161,000,000—thirty times the cost of the Corinth Canal, which the Roman Empire under Nero undertook, but did not finish and three-eights more than the great Suez Canal." This is for the re-enforcement of New York's water supply, which will thereby be increased by five hundred million gallons every twenty-four hours, led under the Hudson, more than one hundred miles away from the seven artificial lakes to be constructed in the Catskills; and of these sources that at Ashokan alone, the Times says, will contain more water than all three of the lakes of Killarney. Eighteen years are allowed for the performance of this giganic task, and by that time, 1925, it is estimated that the population of New York city will be not less than seven millions. The Post is responsible, however, for this estimate.

"Owen Moore Went Away, Owen Moore Than He Could Pay; Owen Moore Came Back One Day, Owen Moore."

Poor Mr. Owen Moore no doubt lived in a small city or town where he tried to make a living by running a store. The people who were his neighbors in that town and on the farms around town bought most of their things from the great Mail Order houses, neglecting to trade with Mr. Moore.

Quite naturally, Mr. Moore failed in business and went away owing more than he could pay. He had to go away and find a location in some town where the people patronized home merchants.

But the funny poet who wrote those lines was mistaken about Owen Moore coming back one day. Mr. Moore, having been burnt once, would not stick his fingers in the same fire again. No, indeed! Mr. Moore would stay away, not because he was Owen Moore than he could pay, but because if he ever came back and started again in business there he would be Owen Moore still. He would let the old town continue to grow street grass.

Have you been the cause of any Owen Moore tragedies in your town?

AN "oldest inhibitants" avers that there was "plenty of ice in July and August of 1816." We do not doubt it; there was plenty of ice in July and August of 1906. And the men who sold it are living in very handsome brownstone fronts, too.

THE ROOSEVELT GUN.

Beyond question a sort of surprise wave has swept over the country following the spread of the information that the president carries a gun in his right hip pocket. But surprile will doutless subside upon due reflection. The hip-pocket shooter is entirely in accord with the Rooseveltian ideals of "speak softly but carry a big stick;" "the surest guarantee of peace is to be constantly prepared for war," etc. That the President himself is constantly prepared for war must not be taken as a sign that he is not, all the same, an ardent lover of peace. It is a sign, however, that he is not an acceptor of the Tolstoi doctrine of nonresistance. He is not the kind of peace advocate that is disposed to turn the other cheek. Early experiences have much to do with forming habits of thinking. Possibly during those years when Mr. Roosevelt was ranching and living under social conditions that rendered the seven-shooter a necessary implement in daily avocations he had indelibly impressed upon his mind the wisdom of the Western saying, "You may never have use for your gun, but if you do need it, you will need it awful bad."

There is no fitness in remarking that Washington is different from Wyoming. The American people have reason to know that the president of the country is a shining mark for the criminial crank There are many, however—a large majority most likely—who will dissent from the suggestion that the president of the country should go around equipped to respond in kind to the deadly onset that may be made upon him. If the fact of being armed would add in only a fractional degree to his own safety, there is no adequate reason that can be urged against the President's hip-pocket arsenal. And it certainly cannot be assumed that a situation might not be encountered in which the President's quickness with the gun would be not only his surest, but his only, protection. There cannot be a bodyguard constantly at his side. It is intolerable to a man of the President's charecteristics to be guarded, whenever he goes abroad, like the Turkish Sultan or the Shah of Persia. The President early acquired the Western habit of watching that the fellow does not "get the drop." Perhaps we should reflect, considering that three American presidents have been murdered, that this is not a bad mental habit for a president to carry around with him, together with a seven-shooter that is handy to the draw.

ONE DAY FOR REST.

"Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work, but the seventh is the Sabbath of the Lord, thy God, in it thou shalt not do any work," &c.

Not only is this command imperative for man's spiritual good, but for his mental and physical well-being. Efforts have been made from time to time by legislation in various states to enforce by law a more general observance of the Sabbath, commonly called Sunday, the idea being to carry out the Biblical injunction quoted above. Resolutions recently passed by the convertion of the Protestant Episcopal church of the Diocese of Maryland, assembled in Baltimore, while strongly in "disapprobation of the increased disregard for the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday," seem to relax strict insistence of the Biblical command by laying stress upon the need of "one day in every seven for a day of rest," whether that day be the Sabbath or some other day. This inference may be drawn from the following clause in the resolutions:

"That the members of this convention exert their influence to persuade all corporations and other employers of labor to reduce to the lowest possible point of necessity all secular work on Sunday; and to see that all persons necessarily employed on that day be given some other one day in every seven for a day of rest."

This may be regarded by some as a compromise; if so it is a happy one. The idea of mental and physical repose, aside from its spiritual feature, is a wise intendment in God's command. In the great plan of His creation He has provided periods of rest for all animate things. The necessity of rest permits of no discussion. It is admitted by all sorts of people that one day in seven ought to be set apart as a day of rest. Many believe that this ought to be done in the interest of bodily health, good morals and religion. The argument in favor of both phases of the resolution could be extended to a great length. The subject admits of no contravention. The plan of the convention, as embodied in its resolutions should be pursued and have the co-operation of all religious and secular bodies and all classes of citizens in the state. It may be possible to secure legislation along the line of "some other one day in every seven for a day of rest."

REPORT OF THE GRAND TURY.

Comprehensive Outline of the Work Done—Complimentary to the Court and State's Attorney.

Last Friday morning, after making the following report Judge Henderson discharged the grand jury from further service at this time:

To the Honorable, the Judges for the Circuit Court for Garrett County:

"The Grand Jury for the June Term of said county, having to the best of our ability performed the duties devolving upon us as a members of this body, we now desire to report to the Court our proceedings and receive our discharge.

"In the performance of the trust reposed in us we have endeavored to do so without fear or favor, in accordance with the oath that was administered to us, and the charge your Honor delivered in our presence in committing these matters to our consideration and judgment.

"We have found presentments in all cases in which we believe the evidence justified, and have ignored trivial cases, and cases in which the evidence did not appear to warrant a presentment; some of these latter cases were in our opinion quite important and of a serious nature, and we would suggest to the proper authorities that further inquiries be made in regard to the same.

"In our deliberations we have examined 128 witnesses and have found twenty-five true bills of indictment. At least half of the time we were in session was taken up in the investigation of the violations of the liquor law, and during our deliberations examined many witnesses on this point. From our experience with some of these witnesses, we are convinced that they deliberately perjured themselves, in an effort to shield the party or parties who have furnished them with liquor and violated the law. However, we had no means to verify this conjecture, but it seems that some of these places are not only making drunkards of our young men, but also corrupt them to the extent of wholly disregarding the solemnity and sanctity of an oath.

"As by law, we inspected the records of the county and the public buildings and found the former kept in as good condition as the present quarters will admit of, and in view of the fact that we are shortly to have a new court house, the Jury will make no recommendations along this line.

"We however, do recommend that the County Commissioners take immediate steps to improve the conditions around the Sheriff's house and Jail. The grounds are in a miserable condition, not at all in keeping with the building, and the same should be properly graded and put in grass; this could be done with very little money, and in our judgment, would be judiciously expended.

"We would also call the attention of the County Commissioners to the filthy condition of the yard in the rear of the Jail, and would suggest that the same be cleaned up if for no other reason, on sanitary grounds.

"The Sheriff's house and new Jail is a building that every citizen of Garrett county can feel proud of, but in our examination of the interior of this building we notice that some of the walls are discolored from several leaks in the roof, and would recommend that this be remedied at once, for if it is allowed to continue, it will do much damage.

"We desire to acknewledge the kindness and courtesy received by us from your Honor, and all the officials of the county, with whom our labors brought us in contact, and we especially desire to express our appeciation of the invaluable aid and assistance rendered by the State's Attorney, Mr. Thayer, in the course of our investigations. The long experience which he has had in the work of the office has fitted him for the discharge of his duty, and the time consumed by our deliberations has been materially shortened by the able assistance rendered by the State's Attorney, and thereby a considerable saving to the county has been made.

"Respectfully submitted.

CHAS. S. DAVIS, Foreman.

P. E. FINZEL, Clerks.

The progress of cities is measured by the public spirit of their inhabitants. Men whose only interest is in the sucess of their individual business may make money for themselves, but they cannot build successful cities any more than a pile of stone can furnish sustenance for growing plants.

It is purposed to erect an interstate bridge between Luke, Allegany county, Md., and Beryl (West Virginia Junction), W. Va. It is said that the coal companies will contribute towards the structure. Allegany county, Maryland, and Mineral county, West Virginia, will also be contributors.

Mr. John W. Comp, of Altamont, who has recently been promoted to the position of superintendent of water stations by the Baltimore and Ohio, with all stations between Peidmont and Grafton under his supervision, was in Oakland Monday when he made this office a pleasant visit.

Mr. U. G. Palmer, of Hutton, left Oakland last Monday night for a brief visit to his son near Washington. From that city he will depart for a tour of the west, stopping at Goldfield, Nevada, Boise, Idaho, and other cities. He will also visit the Pacific Coast before his return to Garrett county, which will probably be within two months.

Ralph Thayer, son of Mr. and Mrs. F. A. Thayer, who has been a student at Western Maryland College during the winter and spring, returned to Oakland Saturday evening for the summer vacation. In the fall Master Thayer will go to Lehigh University where he will enter the engineering department and take up the study of civil and electrical engineering.

Mr. Patrick E. Finzel, of District No. 9, who was one of the grand jurors at the present term of the Circuit Court, remained in Oakland over Sunday with friends after his discharge on Friday from further service as a juryman. Mr. Finzel numbers among his friends and acquaintances in Oakland nearly every resident of the town, he being popular with men in every walk of life.

There are two little words, simple enongh in themselves, that introduce untold trouble in the world and are responsible for more gossip, scandal and harm than any two words in the English language. Those two words are nothing more than "They say." They have done more to ruin the reputation than all other things. If you never quote what "they say" you may be quite certain you are not a gossip.

Mr. G. W. Eckles, who will manage the Oakland Hotel this summer, arrived in Oakland last Thursday, being accompanied here by Mrs. Eckles and their two children. On Friday night a number of housecleaners arrived from Baltimore and Washington, since which time they have been actively engaged in putting the hotel in order for the reception of guests on the 29th inst., when the place will be formally opened for their reception.

The greatest problem that confronts our people at the present time is that of dogs. In the language of our forefathers, there are dogs, more dogs and lots of dogs; in fact a stranger visiting our town and unacquainted with the color of our population, would declare without hesitation, that he had got off at an Indian village, where there are always ten dogs to every Indian. What is to be done to rid our town of dogs, is something that the present council should busy itself with.

Mr. Daniel Miller, for many years employed by Capt. James A. Hayden in the mechanical department of The Republican when the paper was owned by him, but for more than fifteen years a resident of Washington, D. C., where he is at present in the employ of the Government Printing Office, come up to Oakland on Wednesday night of last week to remain here until the latter part of the month at the guest of his sisters, Mrs. Mary Brady and Miss Emily Miller, and his brother, Mr. Truman Miller.

In a small city like this the vice of rash judgment is altogether too common. Where people know nearly all their fellow citizens there are some who are so ungracious and so un-Christian as to attribute an evil motive when the actions are prompted by the best of motives, and they are rather disposed to relish a rumor that reflects against a neighbor. Everybody commits indiscretions, either willfully or through igorance or weakness; but harsh criticism and rash judgments do not help the offender, but shove him down. The golden rule should be applied in such cases.

Mr. Meshach Mattingly, who served as a grand juror at the present term of the Circuit Court, made this office a welcome visit on Friday just prior to starting for his home at Hoyes. Speaking of the weather then prevailing Mr. Mattingly recalled the fact that last year he planted corn on May 17th and on June 10th he went over his field and found that comparatively few grains had shown through the ground, but notwithstanding this backwardness in growing he said that his crop of corn last year was up to the average in yield. With the present weather the conditions are almost identical with last year, a fact which Mr. Mattingly said the people generally had either overlooked or had forgotten. For himself he took a rosy view of the situation and predicts that crops this year will be as good as in former seasons.

STORE ROBBED AT ELDER.

Entrance Gained Through Window and Money Till Plundered by Thief.

The store of Silas F. Cuppett, located on Elder Hill, midway between Hoyes and Friendsville, was entered a few days ago by a thief who robbed the till of about five dollars in silver and pennies, besides stealing some candies and tobacco.

Entrance to the store was effected through a window which was raised by the thief during the absence of Mr. Cuppett from his place of business.

What Is Christian Education Doing for the Young.

The following paper was read in the annual benevolent exercises at Selbysport M. E. church, June 9, 1907, as prepared by Miss Mattie Riley, one of the competent young lady school teachers of Garrett county, and requested to be published in THE REPUBLICAN:

What Christian education is doing for the young, may be summed up briefly or may be expanded according to the amount of oratory the speaker may be capable of putting into it.

In either phase of the topic, we today scarcely deem a young man or a young lady thoroughly educated unless they have a Christian education. That is to say, they should have acquired a knowledge of the true Christ and be firm believers in the same. It is only too evident that we sometimes meet college graduates who are reckless, thoughtless and immoral in the most remote sense. To such young persons their education, which no doubt has cost a fond parent years of toil and drudgery, is only a means of leading them still farther away. They assume the thought that because they are highly educated their education will served as a support to their weak character. How easily the assumption might be true if the education possessed were only a Christian education.

As to what a Christian education will do for the young may be told in few words.

Briefly, it will do everything if rightly applied. It will help the young starting out in life to fight life's battles, solve life's mysteries and overcome any or all difficulties.

The boy and girl who possess a true Christian education can safely enter into the labors of their chosen profession, for they have the promised thought always in view, "If God be for us, who can be against us." They need not fear friend nor foe for their own conscience audibly say to them, "thou art safe."

What Christian education is doing for the young may also be clearly demonstraten by referring to the missionary fields of China, India, Japan and Africa. The thousands of native youth that are being raised from the pits of degradation and ignorance by our missionaries, are receiving a Christian education and are themselves coming to the front competent and willing to take their places among the Christianized educated and are doing perhaps as much accordingly for their own native people as are our American missionaries. This shows that our missionaries have been given a Christian education and are diffusing the same among those with whom they come in contact. They have taken up life's work cheerfully and willingly looking forward to the promised crown of righteousness as their reward. It is scarcely essential in this enlightened age to state how a Christian education may be obtained. But to any of the young who are sufficiently querulous, we would simply say that the opportunities were never so great in the annals of history. Churches and chapels are everywhere dotted over this beautiful land of ours. In all of these Sabbath schools, Epworth Leagues, Young Mens' Christian Associations, Ladies' Aid Societies and everything good is being organized add conducted in a purely spiritual manner for the benefit and instruction for the young. Therefore, all that is necessary for a person to secure a Christian education, is the earnest application of self to the study of God's word and the the teachings of the same by His people.

COME IN AND GET ACQUAINTED

Marsden's Probation.

By ALICE CLARKE.

Copyright, 1907, by C. H. Sutcliffe.

"What is the work?" asked Marsden as he pocketed the letter. John Dufford looked at him over his steel bowed spectacles.

"When I was a lad," he said severely, "young men did not pick and choose. They were glad to take what they could get. You want to marry my daughter and have come to me to ask for work to prove yourself worthy of her. I give you a letter to my superintendent, and you calmly ask the nature of the employment."

"I merely wanted to know what sort of clothes to lay in," Marsden explained in confusion.

"Any man who works needs plain, serviceable clothes," said the elder man reprovingly. "I would suggest that you might leave your evening clothes at home."

"Yes, sir," answered Marsden obediently as he rose to go.

"Now, it is clearly understood," Dufford said sharply, "that you are not to write or hold any communication with my daughter for two years. That is agreed to?"

"I promise."

"And on my part I promise that if at the end of two years I find that my superintendent gives a good report of your industry I shall withdraw my objection to your marriage."

He swung back to his desk, and Jim Marsden, placing the letter in his pocketbook, left the office. There was a farewell visit to Marjorie, followed by a visit to a cheap outfitter's shop, and when the night train pulled out for the west Marsden was a passenger.

It was long before sleep came to him. It seemed unjust that John Dufford should insist upon a two years' apprenticeship, but if Jacob could serve seven years and again seven for Rachel, he should be able to serve for two.

The old man had no particular objection to him save that he had inherited his money. This being the case the stipulation that he should not even write Marjorie, lest he work upon her sympathies, seemed particularly hard, but Dufford was a hard man, and if Marsden wanted Marjorie for his wife, he could only bow to the dictum.

It was four days before he landed in the little Colorado town which was the nearest railroad point to the mine, and the next morning a six hour ride brought him to the desolate collection of buildings grouped around the shaft of the mine, which night and day ground out more wealth for the company of which Dufford was the head.

The superintendent was easily found, and he glanced over the letter Marsden presented.

"All right," he said curtly. "Had any experience firing?"

"Guns or steam engines?" said Marsden.

"You know very well," was the sharp response. "Can you fire an engine?"

"I can," was the quiet answer, "though I have had no experience at the work. It's merely a matter of shoveling coal, isn't it?"

"Shoveling the coal right," corrected the superintendent. "Better take your things over to the bunk house, then go to the engineer and tell him that you're Jim and that Casey is to show you how to fire. What is it, Peters?"

He turned to attend to another man who had entered, and feeling himself dismissed Jim turned away.

Inquiry developed the fact that the bunk house was the long, low shed where the men slept and ate. The Chinaman in charge of the place showed him where to put his trunk at the side of a narrow cot, and presently, clad in a suit of overalls, Jim strolled into the engine room and presented himself to the engineer.

"I am Jim," he said simply. "Mr. Travers said that Casey was to show me how to fire."

The engineer nodded over his shoulder.

"Tell Casey," he said and went on with his oiling.

Casey was more companionable. He deftly elicited information as to Jim's place of hailing and other facts as he made it apparent that Mr. Travers was right when he said that it was not merely a question of shoveling coal.

Coal cost much when it had to be brought from the railroad by a horse car system, the cars going down loaded with ore and coming back with the coal when it was needed. Every shovelful had to be thrown just where it was needed to feed the fire evenly, and Jim's arms ached as he strove to learn the proper twist of the shovel to land the coal in the desired spot.

It was two weeks before he could be trusted on a trick alone, but at last Casey pronounced himself satisfied with Jim's ability, and he reigned over the stoke pit for eight hours a day.

It was hard work for a man whose exercise had been taken in a gymnasium, but Jim rapidly hardened to it, and in six months it had become second habit.

He sent east for books on engineering, and by a mistake a book on electrical engines was sent him instead of the one for which he wrote. He sat down to look it over before he sent it back, and to the original book he added others.

He had been there little more than a year when he sought out Travers and laid a plan before him. Less than half a mile up the valley a constant fall broke over the high cliff and rolled into the valley, 400 feet below. It was Jim's plan to use water power instead of steam and employ a trolley on the tramway.

Travers smiled at first, but Jim worked out the plan for him, and the New York office approved. Jim was put in charge of the plant, and the company raised Travers' salary.

It was well toward the close of the second year that Dufford came to visit the mine. No one knew of his intention until word was telegraphed from the station. The word was flashed about the camp that the old man had come, but the first hint that ladies accompanied him came to Jim as he stood in the door of the power house. The road led past the door, and as he stood listening to the rhythmic pur of the dynamo the familiar sound was broken by the quick beat of horses' hoofs on the hard road, and around the curve swung a maddened broncho with a woman swaying in the saddle.

Marsden sprang into the roadway and in one tense moment fought the insane brute with desperate energy as he was dragged along. Then the fight was won, and he sprang to the saddle just as Marjorie slipped, fainting, from the seat.

"I came because I wanted to see for myself," she explained an hour later as they sat on the porch of the superintendent's cottage. "I could not believe that you had been content for two years as a fireman. Of course, Mr. Travers wanted the credit of introducing the biggest money saving device in the plant, and he did not remember that father was particularly interested in you. Father ought to have been more explicit."

"But it's been a good thing for you," declared Mr. Dufford as he stepped through the doorway. "You've shown the stuff that's in you, and it's mighty good stuff—fit material for a son-in-law. I'm going on to the rest of my holdings in New Mexico as long as I'm out here. As you are going to be put in charge of my mining interests when we get back to New York, you'd better combine a honeymoon and a business trip."

The Sitters In Stations.

"I wonder what all these people do that sit in the various railroad waiting rooms," said the observant man. "You see them in the Grand Central station, in the waiting rooms at Jersey City and Hoboken, sitting down and apparently waiting without end. You see the same types not only in New York, but in any of the railroad waiting rooms of the big cities. They don't seem to have anything to do; a large part of them are not even entertaining themselves by reading. They appear to be watching nothing in particular, and yet there they sit and wait. They don't seem to be interested in the movements of the trains, for they never look up when the 'bawler' comes through. They don't seem to be waiting for anybody, as they show little interest in the crowds that stream through after the arrival of every train.

"There is the mother with the usual assortment of babies, one of them always squalling and the rest of them running around with faces sticky with candy; the thin, ancient dame with an umbrella and a reticule, the elderly gentleman with the black bag, the young lady with the paper backed novel and the young man with the celluloid collar and the red made up necktie. Look any waiting room crowd over, and you always will find these types, and they always are waiting."—New York Press.

Fishes In Captivity.

Fishes in aquariums when first placed in captivity are likely to be wild and to seek constantly to escape. Sooner or later they quiet down, and often they become very tame. They feed well and grow and seem quite settled and content in their new home. But it may be that some fish, after a year of this quiet, routine life, are suddenly seized again with a desire to escape and go wild in their efforts, roaming the tank incessantly and finally killing themselves by running blindly or recklessly into a wall. Fishes are sometimes greatly disturbed by parasites. But fishes that are perfectly sound take on sometimes in this manner, and their actions seem attributable only to the awakening of an intense desire to be free again.

MRS. DOLBY TALKS.

She Tackles the Deacon About His Bad Language.

REFUSES TO ADMIT TRUTH.

Goes on Reading Testimonials While His Better Half Continues Her Lectures—Came Near Making a Full Confession.

[Copyright, 1907, by P. C. Eastment.]

Several little things had happened during the day to cause Deacon Dolby to look forward to a seance after supper had been cleared away, and when the hour finally arrived he was as ready as he could be to take what was in store for him. He sat down in his rocking chair in the sitting room, pulled off his shoes and had been reading testimonials about a new patent windmill for ten minutes when Mrs. Dolby softly began:

"Samuel Dolby, just after breakfast this morning you went to the barn. Something was the matter with the stable door. When it would not open you banged and kicked and muttered, and after five minutes you picked up a big stone and smashed at the door with all your might. At the same time you said something. I was too far off, and you saw me and didn't repeat it, but I want you to tell me right here, now, what it was. Certain rumors have reached my ears, and I want to know if there is any truth in them. Did you say 'Pshaw!' 'Sugar!' or—or—or did you make any reference to that place where bad people go when they die? I know how a door may bother and provoke a person. I had the kitchen door stick with me once, and I hauled off and kicked it and almost said something. You had on a collar that was choking you and was complaining of the earache when you went out, and if you really did forget yourself for once I can find an excuse for you. Throw yourself on my mercy, Samuel, and tell me what you said."

"YOU JUMPED UP AND DOWN AND KICKED THE PUMP."

Deeply Interested.

The deacon had reached testimonial No. 4, and he became deeply interested and forgot to answer the question. Had it been otherwise he might have been compelled to admit that his exclamation had neither "Pshaw!" nor "Sugar!" in it. Mrs. Dolby sat looking at a three-quarter view of him for two or three minutes and then continued:

"At the dinner table today I asked you to pass the fried eggs. The plate was hot, and you burned your fingers and dropped it with a crash. It was bad enough to have the plate broken and the contents spilled over the tablecloth, but that was nothing to what you said. As the plate fell you yelled. As I didn't say anything at the time, you probably thought I didn't pay attention, but I want you to know that I did. Samuel Dolby, you are a man fifty-nine years old, a deacon of the church and supposed to be a living example before the world, and yet when you burned your fingers you yelled 'Thunderation!' Don't deny it, sir, I not only heard it, but I wrote it down on the pantry door as soon as I got up. It will remain there as long as we live in this house, and I shall never see it without having cold chills go over me. What have you got to say for yourself?"

He had nothing whatever to say, but something like a smile appeared at the corners of his mouth. He was thinking what he would have said had he stubbed his toe instead of burning his fingers. He could have defended the word "thunderation" as perfectly proper under all occasions of sudden excitement, but before he had made up his mind to do so Mrs. Dolby went on:

Fell Downstairs.

"At 3 o'clock this afternoon I asked you to go up into the garret and get down my quilt frames while I went over to see Mrs. Green about fall pickles. Just as I returned you fell downstairs with such a clatter that for a moment I thought the house had been struck with a cyclone. I was so excited and I came so near fainting away that I don't remember what you said, but I know you yelled out at least four times. Samuel, I want you to tell me exactly what you said. It was something dreadful, but perhaps under the circumstances I can excuse it, and you can make a fresh start. I know that a fall downstairs is a sudden thing, and it is liable to throw even a deacon off his balance. Did one of your expressions refer to the bad place, Samuel?"

All four of his yells were directly connected with the locality mentioned, as he distinctly remembered, but the deacon didn't propose to enter into any arguments or discussions. He had said what he had said, and if Mrs. Dolby had any doubts about it then all the better for him, and he had made a safe escape of it. He tried his best to become deeply interested in testimonial No. 6, which stated that the None Such windmill only needed the breath of a sleeping babe to set it in motion, and after heaving a few sighs over the general situation Mrs. Dolby brought forward the last offense.

Shouted Three Different Times.

"When I was ready to set about getting supper I asked you to bring me in a pail of fresh water from the well. You went out with the pail, and I suddenly heard some one shout out. I went to the door and found you lying on your back on the ground. You had struck your toe against the soap kettle and fallen down. I didn't say anything, Samuel—not a word. I don't think you even saw me. I am not asking you what you said when you fell down, because I think it was 'Oh, my!' but what I want explained is what you said later on when you found the pump stuck fast. When you had worked away at the handle and the water wouldn't come you jumped up and down and kicked the pump and shouted, '—— it, —— it, —— it!' three different times. I was having a chill, and my fingers were in my ears, and so I didn't catch the words, but I must know. You must confess to me and trust to me to forgive you if I can. What does a man say when he grabs the pump handle and jumps up and down and looks red in the face? If you don't speak right up and tell me I shall think the very worst—that is, I do think the very worst now. If one of the neighbors should run in to borrow some saleratus I don't know how I could look her in the face. I shall keep thinking and thinking after I get to bed, and there will be no sleep for me unless this matter is cleared up."

But for a slight incident Mr. Dolby might have entered into a full explanation and had the whole thing over with. His eye caught sight of a shirt button on the floor, and he stooped and picked it up and gazed at it so long that Mrs. Dolby forgot the question she had asked and said:

"And there's another thing, Samuel, while I think of it. A week ago one morning while you was milking the cow she hauled off and kicked you. You went off the stool on your back and lay there for two or three minutes. Then you got up and pounded her with the stool. Every time you pounded you said something. I was down cellar looking over the pickles and didn't hear it, but Mrs. Harrison says she saw and heard everything and didn't get over shivering until sundown. What was it you said? If you will throw yourself upon my mercy and tell me the truth, I'll agree not to apply for a divorce."

The deacon laid down the circular as if he intended to make a full confession of the affair and depend upon Mrs. Dolby's wifely heart to forgive, but after a moment's thought he changed his mind and let his eyes fall upon the last testimonial. It was only ten lines long, and he read it over three times, while she waited for his answer amid deep silence. By and by he yawned and stretched and got up on his feet, and, going over to the clock, he wound it up and carelessly observed:

"If you are going to make soft soap tomorrer, I guess we'd better get to bed a little early tonight."

Marsden's Probation.

By ALICE CLARKE.

Copyright, 1907, by C. H. Sutcliffe.

"What is the work?" asked Marsden as he pocketed the letter. John Dufford looked at him over his steel bowed spectacles.

"When I was a lad," he said severely, "young men did not pick and choose. They were glad to take what they could get. You want to marry my daughter and have come to me to ask for work to prove yourself worthy of her. I give you a letter to my superintendent, and you calmly ask the nature of the employment."

"I merely wanted to know what sort of clothes to lay in," Marsden explained in confusion.

"Any man who works needs plain, serviceable clothes," said the elder man reprovingly. "I would suggest that you might leave your evening clothes at home."

"Yes, sir," answered Marsden obediently as he rose to go.

"Now, it is clearly understood," Dufford said sharply, "that you are not to write or hold any communication with my daughter for two years. That is agreed to?"

"I promise."

"And on my part I promise that if at the end of two years I find that my superintendent gives a good report of your industry I shall withdraw my objection to your marriage."

He swung back to his desk, and Jim Marsden, placing the letter in his pocketbook, left the office. There was a farewell visit to Marjorie, followed by a visit to a cheap outfitter's shop, and when the night train pulled out for the west Marsden was a passenger.

It was long before sleep came to him. It seemed unjust that John Dufford should insist upon a two years' apprenticeship, but if Jacob could serve seven years and again seven for Rachel, he should be able to serve for two.

The old man had no particular objection to him save that he had inherited his money. This being the case the stipulation that he should not even write Marjorie, lest he work upon her sympathies, seemed particularly hard, but Dufford was a hard man, and if Marsden wanted Marjorie for his wife, he could only bow to the dictum.

It was four days before he landed in the little Colorado town which was the nearest railroad point to the mine, and the next morning a six hour ride brought him to the desolate collection of buildings grouped around the shaft of the mine, which night and day ground out more wealth for the company of which Dufford was the head.

The superintendent was easily found, and he glanced over the letter Marsden presented.

"All right," he said curtly. "Had any experience firing?"

"Guns or steam engines?" said Marsden.

"You know very well," was the sharp response. "Can you fire an engine?"

"I can," was the quiet answer, "though I have had no experience at the work. It's merely a matter of shoveling coal, isn't it?"

"Shoveling the coal right," corrected the superintendent. "Better take your things over to the bunk house, then go to the engineer and tell him that you're Jim and that Casey is to show you how to fire. What is it, Peters?"

He turned to attend to another man who had entered, and feeling himself dismissed Jim turned away.

Inquiry developed the fact that the bunk house was the long, low shed where the men slept and ate. The Chinaman in charge of the place showed him where to put his trunk at the side of a narrow cot, and presently, clad in a suit of overalls, Jim strolled into the engine room and presented himself to the engineer.

"I am Jim," he said simply. "Mr. Travers said that Casey was to show me how to fire."

The engineer nodded over his shoulder.

"Tell Casey," he said and went on with his oiling.

Casey was more companionable. He deftly elicited information as to Jim's place of hailing and other facts as he made it apparent that Mr. Travers was right when he said that it was not merely a question of shoveling coal.

Coal cost much when it had to be brought from the railroad by a horse car system, the cars going down loaded with ore and coming back with the coal when it was needed. Every shovelful had to be thrown just where it was needed to feed the fire evenly, and Jim's arms ached as he strove to learn the proper twist of the shovel to land the coal in the desired spot.

It was two weeks before he could be trusted on a trick alone, but at last Casey pronounced himself satisfied with Jim's ability, and he reigned over the stoke pit for eight hours a day.

It was hard work for a man whose exercise had been taken in a gymnasium, but Jim rapidly hardened to it, and in six months it had become second habit.

He sent east for books on engineering, and by a mistake a book on electrical engines was sent him instead of the one for which he wrote. He sat down to look it over before he sent it back, and to the original book he added others.

He had been there little more than a year when he sought out Travers and laid a plan before him. Less than half a mile up the valley a constant fall broke over the high cliff and rolled into the valley, 400 feet below. It was Jim's plan to use water power instead of steam and employ a trolley on the tramway.

Travers smiled at first, but Jim worked out the plan for him, and the New York office approved. Jim was put in charge of the plant, and the company raised Travers' salary.

It was well toward the close of the second year that Dufford came to visit the mine. No one knew of his intention until word was telegraphed from the station. The word was flashed about the camp that the old man had come, but the first hint that ladies accompanied him came to Jim as he stood in the door of the power house. The road led past the door, and as he stood listening to the rhythmic pur of the dynamo the familiar sound was broken by the quick beat of horses' hoofs on the hard road, and around the curve swung a maddened broncho with a woman swaying in the saddle.

Marsden sprang into the roadway and in one tense moment fought the insane brute with desperate energy as he was dragged along. Then the fight was won, and he sprang to the saddle just as Marjorie slipped, fainting, from the seat.

"I came because I wanted to see for myself," she explained an hour later as they sat on the porch of the superintendent's cottage. "I could not believe that you had been content for two years as a fireman. Of course, Mr. Travers wanted the credit of introducing the biggest money saving device in the plant, and he did not remember that father was particularly interested in you. Father ought to have been more explicit."

"But it's been a good thing for you," declared Mr. Dufford as he stepped through the doorway. "You've shown the stuff that's in you, and it's mighty good stuff—fit material for a son-in-law. I'm going on to the rest of my holdings in New Mexico as long as I'm out here. As you are going to be put in charge of my mining interests when we get back to New York, you'd better combine a honeymoon and a business trip."

The Sitters In Stations.

"I wonder what all these people do that sit in the various railroad waiting rooms," said the observant man. "You see them in the Grand Central station, in the waiting rooms at Jersey City and Hoboken, sitting down and apparently waiting without end. You see the same types not only in New York, but in any of the railroad waiting rooms of the big cities. They don't seem to have anything to do; a large part of them are not even entertaining themselves by reading. They appear to be watching nothing in particular, and yet there they sit and wait. They don't seem to be interested in the movements of the trains, for they never look up when the 'bawler' comes through. They don't seem to be waiting for anybody, as they show little interest in the crowds that stream through after the arrival of every train.

"There is the mother with the usual assortment of babies, one of them always squalling and the rest of them running around with faces sticky with candy; the thin, ancient dame with an umbrella and a reticule, the elderly gentleman with the black bag, the young lady with the paper backed novel and the young man with the celluloid collar and the red made up necktie. Look any waiting room crowd over, and you always will find these types, and they always are waiting."—New York Press.

Fishes In Captivity.

Fishes in aquariums when first placed in captivity are likely to be wild and to seek constantly to escape. Sooner or later they quiet down, and often they become very tame. They feed well and grow and seem quite settled and content in their new home. But it may be that some fish, after a year of this quiet, routine life, are suddenly seized again with a desire to escape and go wild in their efforts, roaming the tank incessantly and finally killing themselves by running blindly or recklessly into a wall. Fishes are sometimes greatly disturbed by parasites. But fishes that are perfectly sound take on sometimes in this manner, and their actions seem attributable only to the awakening of an intense desire to be free again.

A Poor Rule Then.

MRS. DOLBY TALKS.

She Tackles the Deacon About His Bad Language.

REFUSES TO ADMIT TRUTH.

Goes on Reading Testimonials While His Better Half Continues Her Lectures—Came Near Making a Full Confession.

[Copyright, 1907, by P. C. Eastment.]

Several little things had happened during the day to cause Deacon Dolby to look forward to a seance after supper had been cleared away, and when the hour finally arrived he was as ready as he could be to take what was in store for him. He sat down in his rocking chair in the sitting room, pulled off his shoes and had been reading testimonials about a new patent windmill for ten minutes when Mrs. Dolby softly began:

"Samuel Dolby, just after breakfast this morning you went to the barn. Something was the matter with the stable door. When it would not open you banged and kicked and muttered, and after five minutes you picked up a big stone and smashed at the door with all your might. At the same time you said something. I was too far off, and you saw me and didn't repeat it, but I want you to tell me right here, now, what it was. Certain rumors have reached my ears, and I want to know if there is any truth in them. Did you say 'Pshaw!' 'Sugar!' or—or—or did you make any reference to that place where bad people go when they die? I know how a door may bother and provoke a person. I had the kitchen door stick with me once, and I hauled off and kicked it and almost said something. You had on a collar that was choking you and was complaining of the earache when you went out, and if you really did forget yourself for once I can find an excuse for you. Throw yourself on my mercy, Samuel, and tell me what you said."

"YOU JUMPED UP AND DOWN AND KICKED THE PUMP."

Deeply Interested.

The deacon had reached testimonial No. 4, and he became deeply interested and forgot to answer the question. Had it been otherwise he might have been compelled to admit that his exclamation had neither "Pshaw!" nor "Sugar!" in it. Mrs. Dolby sat looking at a three-quarter view of him for two or three minutes and then continued:

"At the dinner table today I asked you to pass the fried eggs. The plate was hot, and you burned your fingers and dropped it with a crash. It was bad enough to have the plate broken and the contents spilled over the tablecloth, but that was nothing to what you said. As the plate fell you yelled. As I didn't say anything at the time, you probably thought I didn't pay attention, but I want you to know that I did. Samuel Dolby, you are a man fifty-nine years old, a deacon of the church and supposed to be a living example before the world, and yet when you burned your fingers you yelled 'Thunderation!' Don't deny it, sir. I not only heard it, but I wrote it down on the pantry door as soon as I got up. It will remain there as long as we live in this house, and I shall never see it without having cold chills go over me. What have you got to say for yourself?"

He had nothing whatever to say, but something like a smile appeared at the corners of his mouth. He was thinking what he would have said had he stubbed his toe instead of burning his fingers. He could have defended the word "thunderation" as perfectly proper under all occasions of sudden excitement, but before he had made up his mind to do so Mrs. Dolby went on:

Fell Downstairs.

"At 3 o'clock this afternoon I asked you to go up into the garret and get down my quilt frames while I went over to see Mrs. Green about fall pickles. Just as I returned you fell downstairs with such a clatter that for a moment I thought the house had been struck with a cyclone. I was so excited and I came so near fainting away that I don't remember what you said, but I know you yelled out at least four times. Samuel, I want you to tell me exactly what you said. It was something dreadful, but perhaps under the circumstances I can excuse it, and you can make a fresh start. I know that a fall downstairs is a sudden thing, and it is liable to throw even a deacon off his balance. Did one of your expressions refer to the bad place, Samuel?"

All four of his feet were directly connected with the locality mentioned, as he distinctly remembered, but the deacon didn't propose to enter into any arguments or discussions. He had said what he had said, and if Mrs. Dolby had any doubts about it then all the better for him, and he had made a safe escape of it. He tried his best to become deeply interested in testimonial No. 6, which stated that the None Such windmill only needed the breath of a sleeping babe to set it in motion, and after heaving a few sighs over the general situation Mrs. Dolby brought forward the last offense.

Shouted Three Different Times.

"When I was ready to set about getting supper I asked you to bring me in a pail of fresh water from the well. You went out with the pail, and I suddenly heard some one shout out. I went to the door and found you lying on your back on the ground. You had struck your toe against the soap kettle and fallen down. I didn't say anything, Samuel—not a word. I don't think you even saw me. I am not asking you what you said when you fell down, because I think it was 'Oh, my!' but what I want explained is what you said later on when you found the pump stuck fast. When you had worked away at the handle and the water wouldn't come you jumped up and down and kicked the pump and shouted, '—— it, —— it, —— it!' three different times. I was having a chill, and my fingers were in my ears, and so I didn't catch the words, but I must know. You must confess to me and trust to me to forgive you if I can. What does a man say when he grabs the pump handle and jumps up and down and looks red in the face? If you don't speak right up and tell me I shall think the very worst—that is, I do think the very worst now. If one of the neighbors should run in to borrow some saleratus I don't know how I could look her in the face. I shall keep thinking and thinking after I get to bed, and there will be no sleep for me unless this matter is cleared up."

But for a slight incident Mr. Dolby might have entered into a full explanation and had the whole thing over with. His eye caught sight of a shirt button on the floor, and he stooped and picked it up and gazed at it so long that Mrs. Dolby forgot the question she had asked and said:

"And there's another thing, Samuel, while I think of it. A week ago one morning while you was milking the cow she hauled off and kicked you. You went off the stool on your back and lay there for two or three minutes. Then you got up and pounded her with the stool. Every time you pounded you said something. I was down cellar looking over the pickles and didn't hear it, but Mrs. Harrison says she saw and heard everything and didn't get over shivering until sundown. What was it you said? If you will throw yourself upon my mercy and tell me the truth, I'll agree not to apply for a divorce."

The deacon laid down the circular as if he intended to make a full confession of the affair and depend upon Mrs. Dolby's wifely heart to forgive, but after a moment's thought he changed his mind and let his eyes fall upon the last testimonial. It was only ten lines long, and he read it over three times, while she waited for his answer amid deep silence. By and by he yawned and stretched and got up on his feet, and, going over to the clock, he wound it up and carelessly observed:

National and State Universities

By President HADLEY of Yale.

THE history of our country in every department of national life is a story of INTERACTIONS between the east and the west. The history of collegiate education is no exception to this general rule. Until the early part of the nineteenth century the work of higher education was done by a few colleges IN THE EAST. These were, with few exceptions, sectarian or narrow. The founding of state universities introduced wider views. For more than half of the nineteenth century the state universities of the west stood for a BROADER CONCEPTION of university training than that which generally prevailed in the east.

But in the last forty years the eastern universities have undergone a great change. They have widened their conception of what a college should do. They differ from the western institutions not so much in the things they teach as in the CHARACTER AND TRADITIONS of the student body. Their constituency is national and not local. Their associations are not with one or two generations alone, but with many. Amid the disintegrating tendencies of American life they form an overwhelmingly strong cohesive element. Not Yale alone, but Harvard and Princeton and other colleges like them represent a distinctive feature in American life which is likely to become MORE AND MORE IMPORTANT as time goes on.

These endowed universities of the east are NATIONAL. The state universities of the west are by contrast LOCAL. I am unwilling to say a single word which would appear as a criticism of the system of state universities. They are rendering magnificent services to the country. Nevertheless if this tendency to localize learning went to an extreme our teaching of science and literature would lose half its benefit. We do not want the republic of letters to be organized too sharply ON STATE LINES.

WE NEED TO HAVE PLACES WHERE THE BEST MEN FROM DIFFERENT PARTS OF THE COUNTRY CAN SEE EACH OTHER AND KNOW EACH OTHER, CAN TOIL TOGETHER AND PLAY TOGETHER AND CAN FORM A COHERENT PUBLIC SENTIMENT WHICH SHALL PREVENT THE POSSIBILITY OF THAT DISRUPTION IN THOUGHT WHICH ALONE CREATES THE DANGER OF POLITICAL DISRUPTION.

All of Us Like to Laugh.

By GEORGE M. COHAN, Playwright and Actor.

EVERY time you hand out a laugh you make SOMEBODY happy. Any time you are handed a laugh YOU'RE happy.

The hard luck fellow with the doleful tale is the man you try to dodge. The good news man with the joyful story is the one you are ALWAYS glad to meet.

Smile when you approach, and laugh when you leave.

If you MUST tell a man some bad news, don't spring it on him all at once.

Surround seriousness with comedy. Start in by saying something funny, and when he begins to giggle, pull the terrible thing you've got to say and make a quick switch again to the comedy and LEAVE HIM LAUGHING.

I want to tell you something right now, and just jot this down in your memo book: The man with the laugh is the POPULAR MAN, you can bet all you've got on that; the popular man is the prosperous man, and I guess that's a pretty safe wager too.

This is a great big country. Barrels of money in the United States, and wise men laugh themselves into a bank roll.

You want to laugh, I want to laugh, we all want to laugh.

If you are a married man, hand your wife as many laughs as possible. That will make her love you ALL THE MORE. If you have any children, say and do things to make them laugh, and they'll grow up and be happy men and women.

Hand your employer as many laughs as you can, and YOUR JOB IS SAFE, and it will save you thinking up stuff to hand your landlady laughs in order to hang on to the hall room you've laughed your way into.

Make the waiter laugh and he serves you twice as well.

WHEN YOU GO TO THE THEATER, GO THERE TO LAUGH. IF YOU LAUGH, THE FELLOW NEXT TO YOU LAUGHS. IF HE LAUGHS, THE FELLOW NEXT TO HIM LAUGHS, AND AS LAUGHTER IS CONTAGIOUS, THE FIRST THING YOU KNOW THE WHOLE HOUSE IS LAUGHING, THE ACTORS ARE WORKING TWICE AS HARD, YOU GET THREE TIMES AS MUCH FOR YOUR MONEY AND EVERYBODY IS SATISFIED.

The American Lives Too Fast.

By President H. C. KING of Oberlin College.

SHALLOWNESS, a passion for material comfort and a lackadaisical, easy going DISREGARD OF LAW are the besetting sins of the American people.

We are in real danger from the American rush. We pride ourselves on living fast, and we do, but the nation that lives TOO FAST TO THINK is lost.

It is curious that in this age of science, in which the reign of law is supreme, there should be so utter a disregard for law IN MORAL AND SPIRITUAL AFFAIRS. In our reaction from Puritanism we seem to have fallen into a lackadaisical, easy going point of view, as if, somehow or other, we expected to escape the law whenever we so desire. We are in danger of waking with ringing in our ears the awful mockery of those words, "Thou fool!"

I have no doubt that the American people are wrongly interpreted when they are classed as mere money grubbers, and yet the danger of our immense increase in wealth, the danger of the stupefying, DEADENING effect of our passion for material comfort, no man can deny.

OUR PERSONAL AND OUR NATIONAL IDEALS—WE HAD THEM ONCE—ARE IN DANGER.

When You Need Printing Done

You want it to be of the very best kind. As you expect your printed matter to make business it is necessary it should do the talking for you. Poor or indifferent printing cannot do this as it lacks the strong points required to gain and hold the interest of the patron.

¶ In this particular line of work we excel, for several reasons, viz: 1st; we have the largest and best variety of up-to-date type to be found in the western part of the state. 2nd; we carry only the very best grades of papers; and 3rd; the know-how with which to create original and attractive tye display.

¶ You make no mistake when you come to us with an order of printing

HOYES.

The services at St. Dominick's church last Sunday were quite well attended. A number of persons from Oakland were present.

A committee has been appointed to take charge of the practice for Children's Day services which will be in about two weeks at the M. E. church at this place.

Miss Olia Mattingly, who has been attending Normal at Friendsville, was not able to attend this week on account of illness.

Mrs. Carrie Dewitt and two children, of Armstead, spent Saturday and Sunday in Hoyes.

Mr. Rufus Dewitt was at court Monday and Tuesday of this week.

Mrs. Martha Wilburn and several of her family are suffering with measles at this writing.

Mr. Ross Savage went to Lonaconing Monday where he will be employed by Mr. Henry Atkinson to do some carpenter work.

Mrs. W. A. Smith and children, who have had attacks of measles, are all improving at this time.

Rev. H. E. Friend has gone to Keyser, W. Va., to attend the commencement. His daughter, Miss Sadie, will graduate in music and other branches.

Mr. H. R. DeWitt, county treasurer, was in Hoves for a short time the past week.

Mr. W. A. Smith made a business trip to Oakland last Saturday.

EAGLE ROCK.

Weather wet and cold for this time of year. Corn mostly rotted before it came up; oats at a standstill.

Mr. Albert McRobie passed through here Sunday on his way to Oakland.

Mr. Leonard Paugh was visiting in this community Sunday.

Mr. Abraham McRobie, of Blaine, was visiting his parents at this place Sunday.

Mr. John Paugh, while working for Bernard and Brooks last week, got lost on the Thos. Harvey tract of land known as Simpson Ridge, but found his way to the mill after wandering about for about four hours.

W. T. Upole has finished peeling bark.

Miller and Saucer are preparing to install a larger boiler and engine in their mill at this place.

Messrs. Jesse Paugh and Chas. Bernard attended literary at Altamont Saturday night.

Mr. Harry Sollars was visiting his mother Sunday.

Miss Bertha Paugh was visiting her grand parents, Mr. and Mrs. Jehu Paugh, Sunday.

Mr. Geo. Tasker, who has been working for D. M. Lower, is with us again.

Mr. J. S. Miller has moved his family to this place.

Mr. Claud Harvey and family were visiting at Mr. Geo. Moon's Sunday.

ROSE BUD.

BITTINGER.

The farmers complains of a gloomy outlook for the year's harvest, as vegetation is kept at standstill by the wet, cool weather.

While at work with a gang of carpenters early last week, ex-Sheriff A. J Oester had his left arm badly cut by a hatchet falling from the top of a building which was being erected.

Ham. Friend, of Swanton, was in this section last Monday, presumably in quest of political encouragement.

Prof. P. E. King, of the Bittinger Normal school, spent last Saturday and Sunday with friends at Grantsville.

Miss Amanda Ellithorp is visiting relatives near Rockwood, Pa., this week.

Mrs. Sally Ralston was called to Oakland last week to attend Miss Ruth McRobie, who was reported to be critically ill at her home at that place.

C. E. Ellithorp, the merchant of this place, made a business trip to Oakland last week.

T. B. Wiley and son Harry went up to Oakland on business early this week.

Mr. and Mrs. Elias Orendorf drove up to Oakland last Saturday and spent a couple of days with their sons, Jonas and Daniel, who reside near the county seat.

Fred Otto, of New Germany, passed through here last Sunday mouning.

FIKE.

The past week there was considerable rain but much warmer than the preceeding week. There is but little corn up at this writing.

John S. Fike made a flying trip to Markleysburg, Pa., one day last week.

Squire Shipley, of Hinebaugh, has moved on the farm with Mr. Bruce Friend.

Mr. Wm. R. Banthouse has erected an addition to his house, the new part being 24 x 18 feet.

Mrs Louisa Fike was a caller at Mrs. Owen Evans' last Sunday.

The readers of this paper will remember some time ago considerable complaint was made about the supervisor making fish ponds, but now the people would be glad to have no worse than fish ponds for our roads are in a very bad shape for the want of working. Our bridges are impassable and have been for months past. Our present Supervisor is out with his saw mill and evidently never thinks about the roads that he is supposed to keep up.

I understand that if the telephone Co. at this place don't have their wires to give better service, that some of the renters will not pay full rent this year.

Mr. Jeremiah Thomas was in this section last week taking up some coal land.

Mr. Thurman F. Umbel has put a telephone on the Garrett County line.

Mr Bert Watson had one of his horses valued at about $200, to run out of the stable and killed himself by pecking his brains out.

CARTER.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Mrs. Thomas Deveny and family are in their cottage here for the summer.

Mr. S. L. Allen and daughter (Mrs. Alcock) came to the Park Wednesday to put in order Allenhurst and Allen cottage.

Dr. Davis preached an able sermon to a large and appreciative audience at the Hall of Philosophy Sunday evening.

Mr. William Scott, of New York, who had rented one of the Yoder cottages made a change after coming here, and will occupy the Sheets cottage on F street for the season.

Mrs. Campbell has had a well drilled and a derrick erected on which is placed a large tank and now has an abundant supply of pure water for Braethorn.

The Chautauqua Hotel will be furnished water from the well at Hayden's store building.

The electric lights were off Wednesday night to allow the cutting and splicing of the large belt at the power house.

Wednesday Mrs. Chas. S. May, adopted daughter of Mrs. P. T. Garthright, took the latter to her home in Hagerstown, Md.

"Aunt Haley" Duckworth, who has been making her home with Mrs. Garthright for several years, will go to relatives in Somerset county, Pa.

The Snyder cottage on I street and the Enlow cottage on F street have been rented for the season since our last report.

Dr. W. W. and Mrs. Davis were called to Baltimore last Saturday by reason of the death of their brother-in-law, Mr. Kneil.

THE DEATH RECORD.

THOMAS BELT JAMISON.

Died, at his home in Santa Barbara county, California, after an illness of six weeks of heart disease, on Sunday, May 26, 1907, Thomas Belt Jamison, aged nearly seventy-five years. Mr. Jamison, in company with his son-in-law and granddaughter visited relatives in Oakland last fall, being for a number of weeks the guest of his neice, Mrs. John T. Browning, at her home on Second street. He was born at or near Friendsville, this county, and went west about the year 1845. Later he returned to this county and lived for a year or more in Oakland and went to to California again in the year 1849 with a party on prospectors. Mr. Jamison accumulated considerable wealth during his residence in the west and at the time of his death was the owner of a fine ranche in Santa Barbara connty.

Estray Notice.

There came to the Glade View Stock Farm, one mile from Red House, on June 9th, a black mare, obout 12 years old. The owner will please come, identify the animal, pay all costs and damages and take same away.

MANAGER.

Cattle Killed by Lightning.

Tuesday night during the electrical storm which passed over this part of Garrett county, four head of two year cattle were struck by lightning and killed on the Anchorage farm near Deer Park, three of the cattle belonging to Mr. Truman W. Casteel and one the property of John Holtsnider. The animals were lying between two small trees and the marks made on the trees by the lightning indicated that both had been struck at the same instant.

Notify Teddy.

Mr. Richard Housel, formerly of Greenville but now of just across the line in Maryland, was blessed with another boy—making fourteen in all. Mr. Housel appears to have a private arrangement with the stork. All the children are living and lively. He is a brother of Councilman U. M. Housel.—Meyersdale Commercial.

Tragic End of Checkered Life.

James Harrington, who resides near Newburg, W. Va., was apprised of the suicide of his son, Wilbur Harrington in Los Angeles, California. He first fired three shots in the body of a woman and then turned the weapon on himself. The father ordered the body interred at Los Angelss. Young Harrington leaves a wife and two children whom he deserted at Newburg. The details as to the cause of shooting the woman and then taking his own life are lacking. He enlisted in the United States army after he left his family at Newburg, but deserted.

Conductor Hurt by Train.

J. W. Constable, of South Cumberland, a Baltimore and Ohio railroad freight conductor, was struck by passenger train No. 3, at Altamont Sunday morning about 8 o'clock, and seriously injured.

The People Want Power Centralized.

By United States Senator CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW of New York.

WE have a centralization of power and executive authority beyond the dreams of Hamilton, and it is the popular will. But still more remarkable than centralization is the expansion of popular appreciation of the executive office. The presidency has grown into proportions which OVERSHADOW THE CONGRESS and the courts. The people expect the president not only to deliver the messages contemplated by the constitution, but to instruct their representatives on all matters of interest. The formative or restraining hand of the executive is on EVERY DETAIL and proposed amendment of leading measures. There are 90 senators and 386 members of the house of representatives, but apparently the people believe their functions are to ratify recommendations, and they resent INDEPENDENT CONGRESSIONAL SUGGESTIONS which alter bills or opposition to their enactment.

While this expansion of executive power is in harmony with the views and practice of one of the most independent and resourceful of our presidents, even his genius for molding public opinion could not have produced these results if the trend of the popular mind had not been in that direction. The people are supreme, and whatever happens is WHAT THEY DEMAND. The absorption of the time and mind of the citizen by the competitive intensity, higher standards and increased cost of our economic life is rapidly relegating to some trusted leader the INDIVIDUAL INITIATIVE which has been the characteristic of our political development and the glorious mission of government by town meeting.

Over half a century upon the platform and in affairs has taught me one supreme lesson. It is that revolution and evolution, errors of legislation or crazes of the hour, crystallizing into policies, may check FOR THE MOMENT our development, but cannot stay our progress.

With an archaic monetary system which produces periodical panics, raises the rate of interest on money to 100 per cent per annum and prevents our occupying our natural position as the world's center of finance, we have yet built a COMMERCIAL EMPIRE and reaped the harvest of a productive energy beyond the experience of any nation and all periods.

WE HAVE NO MERCHANT MARINE AND PERSISTENTLY REFUSE TO ADOPT THE METHODS BY WHICH RIVAL NATIONS KEEP THEIR FLEETS ON THE OCEAN, AND, THOUGH WE PAY THE FREIGHT TO FOREIGNERS, OUR PRODUCERS MANAGE TO MAINTAIN A STRONG POSITION IN THE MARKETS OF THE WORLD.

The Present Is the Best Time In World's History.

By President E. B. CRAIGHEAD of Tulane University.

WHEN the Roman empire fell, Europe hastened on to the ages of darkness, but throughout the middle ages the Arabs kept aflame the torches of Greek culture until the crimson dawn of the renaissance announced the approach of a better day. The renaissance was the child of Greece. WITHOUT THE RENAISSANCE WE WOULD HAVE HAD NO MODERN WORLD. The Greeks unquestionably were the most cultured people that ever trod this planet.

Not in DARK COLORS would I paint our present civilization, nor do I sympathize with Ruskin, Morris and Carlyle, who fain would roll the centuries back and live again the life of the old Greek world. How bright in sky line and soul shine the picture of that great soul enkindling epoch, the Periclean age! But, while Plato was discussing philosophy and 20,000 cultured Athenians were listening to the new drama of Sophocles, MILLIONS OF SLAVES lived in joyless, hopeless bondage. In her attempted monopoly of BEAUTY, scorning her neighbors as barbarians, in her debasing treatment of women, in her neglect of the aged, in her soul destroying system of slavery, Greece presents a picture AS CHEERLESS AS THE REALMS OF PLUTO.

I would rather live in these the morning hours of the twentieth century than in any of the so called GOLDEN ERAS of the past, because ours is the age that offers hope to ALL mankind.

IN GENERAL AVERAGE OF INTELLIGENCE WE ARE GREATER THAN ANY PEOPLE THAT EVER LIVED.

More of our people have the common blessings of life—food, shelter and raiment. The men who do the world's HARD WORK are treated more humanely than ever before.

Industrial Self Government.

By MORRISON I. SWIFT of Boston, Sociologist.

THE model provided by our Revolutionary ancestors for industrial self government was that certain property confiscated and made common shall be inalienable, just as a man's share in government is inalienable. All men will be shareholders in the PRODUCTIVE PROPERTY of the country without the right to divest themselves of the shares.

This is the principle of popular sovereignty and equal human rights carried over from politics to industry. IT IS SOCIALISM.

One cannot be truly loyal to the idea of self government and not extend it to INDUSTRY. They are not loyal to it who assert, as many learned men do, that it would result in a new and terrible tyranny and slavery. Their argument nude of verbal foliage is that when men efface political kings and popularize rule they become independent and free, but when they extinguish INDUSTRIAL KINGS and popularize the realm of industry and become self ruling in it they lose freedom and become slaves—that is, the way to political freedom is through the abolition of kings, while the way to industrial freedom is through their CREATION AND VENERATION.

IS IT A WONDER THAT THE CRITICS OF SOCIALISM ARE OFTEN SUSPECTED OF LIGHT THINKING OR MORAL LEVITY?

DEER PARK.

The Deer Park hotel, beautifully situated at an altitude of three thousand feet in the Alleghanies, will open for the season on Saturday, the 22nd inst.

There is nothing experimental in connection with the opening of this famed mountain resort, for it has been in operation each summer, without intermission, for a number of years.

Away back in 1871, when the entire Deer Park section was a wild stretch of country, the late John W. Garrett and ex-Senator Henry G. Davis came to Garrett county to select a site for a summer hotel. Ex-Senator Davis was really intent upon locating for the introduction of a lumber plant, and while making observations in that direction, piloted Mr. Garrett through the forest at Deer Park. There was only one horse obtainable at the time, and Mr. Davis very courteously tendered it to Mr. Garrett, who was large and portly, while the Senator sat astride a mule. He has often referred to this, when telling of his early experiences, how they each rode through the woods in single file.

Mr. Davis conducted Mr. Garrett to an eligible site on rising ground, and the latter was in raptures. It was on this very point that the Deer Park hotel was erected. The initial construction consisted of one building and later on an east annex was erected, and later still a west annex, and at the same time a swimming pool, and indeed all the necessary accessories to a full and perfect summer hotel equipment. Then to provide for easy and convenient access to the swimming pool a covered elevated structure was built, connecting the entire hotel with the swimming pool building, so that a guest wishing to take a plunge in the early morning can do so without descending to the main floor, or going to the ground at all.

It was at Deer Park that ex-President and Mrs. Cleveland spent their honeymoon. The marriage occurred just prior to the usual summer opening of the hotel and family cottages and the couple occupied one of the furnished dwellings during their sojourn in the mountain.

Later, an entire summer was spent by ex-Paesident Benjamin Harrison and his family, with Baby McKee; so men of renown have patronized this famous resort, and now as the latter June days approach, many early visitors will begin to arrive to be present at the formal opening on the 22nd inst.

Active work has been going on in preparing the hotel and cottages for speedy occupancy for the influx of summer residents that yearly find cool and quiet in its picturesque seclusion.

For the past five years Mr. W. E. Burwell has been the hotel manager and the increasing patronage each year is an attestation of successful management. Long distance telephones have been installed in each room and additional private baths provided.

The hotel is provided with the purest water, piped from the famous Boiling Spring located three milles away in the Backbone mountain. In connection with the luxurious hotel life, the colony of cottagers adds to the summer enjoyments, and the season when fully advanced, constitutes a round of social festivities most enjoyable.

The fastest trains on the B. and O., with Pullman comforts and conveniences, all make stops at the hotel station, and although the location is in the Allegheny mountains, there is nothing approaching isolation and the guests have the benefit of the pure invigorating climate, with the products of the best markets brought to the door daily.

Notwithstanding the backward spring, the bookings have been very liberal. Pittsburg will be represented by Mr. and Mrs. Robert Wardrop, the Misses Wardrop, Mr. and Mrs. J. Hall and son, Mr. and Mrs. J. Marshall Bell, two children and maid, Mr. and Mrs. Floyd K. Smith, daughter and maid, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Harlow, Miss Harlow and Mr. A. G. Harlow, Mr. and Mrs. Harry S. Calvert, George Calvert and maid, Major and Mrs. George M. Downy, U. S. A., Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Grant McCutcheon, Miss Rebecca, Tom and Jim.

From Baltimore City there will be Mr. James B. Smallwood and Mrs. Smallwood, Mrs. J. Hall Pleasants and maid, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Kefauver, Miss Frances and maid, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Shoemaker of North Calvert street, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Hanlon, Miss M. Edwina Hanlon, Miss Helen Hanlon, Miss C. Lillian Hanlon, Masters Edward K. and Joseph T. Hanlon and maid.

Washington City will have Colonel and Mrs. L. H. Siebert, Miss Sophie and two maids, Colonel and Mrs. A. J. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Percy Cranford, two children and maid, Mrs. and Mrs. P. B. Chase, daughter and son, Mrs. M. E. Norment and companion, Mrs. M. B. Sweitzer and maid, Mrs. E. L. Koon and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Julius Lansburg and Richard Lansburg.

Cincinnati will be represented by Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Strong; Parkersburg, W. Va., by Mr. and Mrs. P. B. McCarty, daughter and maid; Chillicothe, Ohio, Miss M. P. McClintock, mother and maid; and Annapolis, Md., Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Clark.

Mr. Tasker Announces His Candidacy

To the Editor of The Republican:

During the recent term of court hundreds of taxpayers, of every shade of political opinion, have questioned me concerning the facts connected with the history of the deplorable boundary line dispute and the startling percentage of coal lands along said line in both Garrett and Allegauy counties, that are being kept off the assessment books because of said dispute.

Prominent citizens of every district have urged me to have my name printed on the official ballot as a non-partisan taxpayers candidate for the House of Delegates, because I alone have made a lifetime study of these questions and alone possess all the data, plats, abstracts of title, etc., necessary to convince the Legislature that a most monstrous wrong has been perpetrated for thirty-four years against the entire State of Maryland as well as the Garrett and Allegany county taxpayers. For numerous reasons, which will be published during the campaign I have consented, for the first time in my life, to become a candidate and petitions will soon be presented to the voters in every district to have my name appear on the official ballot.

Very truly yours,
HIRAM P. TASKER.

A LETTER FROM MR. U. G. PALMER

On His Way to the Gold Fields of Nevada.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I left Oakland Monday night, June 11, on train No. 4, reaching Washington early Tuesday morning. Washington with its quarter of a million inhabitants is certainly a beautiful city,—the most beautiful on the American continent, if not in the world—and today is a gem of exquisite setting clothed in its fresh and dense mantle of green. It really seems colder than Garrett if that is possible. One of the stores on the Avenue has a placard over its large display of straw hats "ear muffs given away with each straw hat if desired."

The ride from Washington to Charlotte Hall of eighty miles began at 7.50 a. m. and terminated four hours later—transportation that would be inferior to that of the Preston Railroad if the latter would add a passenger car to its service.

Charlotte Hall is certainly an ideal place for a school and the Charlotte Hall Military Academy with its hundred boys is training for all time, the visitor can readily see why Washington was delighted with the "cool springs" there 150 years ago and why the school has an unbroken record of more than a hundred years, and numbers among its graduates many of the most distinguished men in our state and nation. The ride back to Washington in the morning is made on board a train carrying passengers exclusively and hence the running time is shortened by about an hour.

The person who selects train No. 5, for the run from Washington west makes no mistake. The distance to Pittsburg, 302 miles is made with but three stops to Cumberland and three more to Pittsburg in 8¼ hours. Pittsburg, the smoky city—the greatest manufacturing city on earth—the district which originates more freight tonnage than any other district in the world. The passenger who leaves Pittsburg at 10.42 p. m. sees but little of Ohio and Indiana, but arises next morning to get a glimpse of the pickle plants in the latter state of Heinze of Pittsburg—the section in which the farmers raise cucumbers by the ton, the same as the farmers of Garrett raises hay.

Chicago is reached at 9.40 a. m., central time. Chicago's population is fast nearing the two million work—the second largest city in the new world and the metroplis of 3,000,000 square miles of agricultural land, the like in area and fertility of which is nowhere to be found.

This territory is bounded by the Alleghenies and the Rockies, the Gulf and the Peace River in Canada. Some of the most densely populated sections of China support an average of 700 people per square mile. What would be our population if this vast farm of Uncle Sam's had one half that density of population.

Chicago is entertaining two distinguished visitors this week, James Bryce, the British Ambassador, and Mayor Fitzgerald, of Boston.

Mr. Bryce believes that Chicago is a most wonderful city and has no parallel in the modern world, and that it seems to have a future that will completely eclipse all its past achievements.

To illustrate: in the matter of transportation alone, the handling of its freight and passengers by rail, exclusive of its steamship traffic, necessitates arrival and departure of nearly 2000 trains per day.

At 11 tonight I leave for Denver via Omaha, over the Burlington and am due there, 1043 miles distant, at 7.30 a. m. Saturday—a ride of thirty-two and a-half hours.

The cars in the yards at Chicago looked familiar: Fairmont Coal Co. Coal and Coke R. R., B. & O., etc. Now we see scarcely any but D. & R. G., U. P., S. P., N. P., etc., and the sight of a B. & O. is like meeting an old friend.

At Galesburg, Ill., change for St. Louis, Kansas City, St. Paul and Minneapolis, the passager begins to realize he is getting well out into the heart of the great west.

Illinois, Iowa and Nebraska are Uncle Sam's great cornfields. There are hundreds of miles of the richest farm lands conceivable, gently undulating with nothing in sight but corn and cattle. In nature the soil is very similar to Garrett gladelands. Last year we raised 30 bushels of corn for every man, woman and child in the United States, but weather conditions must soon change or we will have a tremendous shortage this year—not a spear to be seen anywhere six inches high and it should be at least three feet on this date.

The Burlington equipment is superb and they run ten or more cars on every train, but traveling is somewhat amazing as there are more passengers than seats so much of the time.

They carry a high class of passengers judging from their dress and appearance and evidently this part of the country has enjoyed a greater degree of prosperity than the east on the part of the masses.

The passenger in night trains out of Chicago crosses the Mississippi and passes through Burlington and across central Iowa in the night and awakes the next morning to look out upon Red Oak, a little town perhaps as large as Oakland, made famous all over this country by an enterprising printer who from this little country place sends out more artistic calendars every year than all the rest of the printers in the country combined.

Omaha is a husky western city of 175,000 people including its South Omaha suburb Great smelters of the Copper Trust are here, grain elevators, a railroad center, as more than half the great trunk lines having terminal there .This was the gateway between the east and the west through which the "argonauts" of '49 passed on their overland journey to California. The two longest iron spans in the world are in the Illinois Central R. R. bridge over the Missouri river between Omaho and Council Bluff.

South Omaha has the thrid largest packing plant in the world and if it continues its present growth it will soon dispute with Chicago for first rate.

The Burlington advertises far and wide the beauty of its station at Omaha. It is of massive Corinthian architecture but in artistic beauty does not equal Mt. Royal at Baltimore.

Lincoln, the capital of Nebraska, 50,000 people, is 55 miles west of Omaha. It is famous for its fine capitol building; its State University with 1600 students or which Dr. Andrews, of peculiar economic views views and formerly president of Brown University, is president; the plant of the Meadow Gold Creamery, the largest in the world, and also of the German paper having the largest circulation of any German paper published in America and last but by no means least the home of Hon. Wm. Jennings Bryan. I did not go out to visit the latter as it is 3½ miles from the center of the city.

Bryan is very popular here, is credited with being a leader in every movement for the best interest of the people of Lincoln and of Nebraska, and a man who has become wealthy through politics. His "Commoner" is a veritable gold mine. He had no practice as a lawyer and according to his neighbors would still have been a "mute inglorious Milton" if politics had not discovered him.

MR. LLOYD LOWNDES FOR STATE COMPTROLLER

Cumberland Man Mentioned by Baltimore American in Most Favorable Terms.

The Baltimore American of Sunday had a number of pictures of available candidates for the Republican nomination for Comptroller. Among them was Mr. Lloyd Lowndes, of Cumberland. Regarding Mr. Lowndes, the American said:

"Another young man, and a banker, who has a clear and accurate insight into the financial and political sides of the comptrollership is Mr. Lloyd Lowndes, of Cumberland, Md. He has been most favorably and most prominently mentioned as an available Republican candidate for comptroller, if the nomination goes to the Western Shore. Mr. Lowndes, however, prefers a legislative career, and if his party desires to bestow any honor upon him he would doubtless be delighted to be elected for the short term in the United States Senate, if the next legislature is in the hands of the Republicans. To whatever position he may be called, Mr. Lowndes will bring a high conception of responsibility and a faithful performance of duty."

Garrett-Allegany Boundry Line.

The following resolutions were adopted by the Deer Park Grange, No. 222, at a recent meeting of the organization, and requested to be published in these columns:

BROTHERS:—It has come to our notice through the pess, and otherwise, that the Garrett-Allegany boundary line is still unsettled after a period of more than thirty years. Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the several Granges in Garrett county take up this work of public necessity, and send men to our halls of Legislature to enact laws to forever settle this very important question on the line known as the Bauer Line, and be it futher.

Resolved, That the several Granges in Garrett county, send to the Pomona Grange of said Garrett county—at its next meeting—at least two delegates to map out lines to proceed on this all important question to the tax payers of of said county, and be it futher

Resolved, That the said Garrett county Pomona Grange communicate with Allegany county Pomona Grange and to other Pomona Granges in the said controversy, all of which is Respectfully submitted.

T. J. GARRETT.

The foregoing resolutions have been approved by this Grange at its meeting April 20, 1907.

President Roosevelt Again Recommends Tax on Incomes and Inheritances.

President Roosevelt made two notable addresses at the Jamestown Exposition on Monday, the first at the dedication of the Georgia Building and the second before the National Editorial Association. In the two speeches he covered a wide range of subjects, including the growth of the South, the suppression of child labor, the liability of employers for accidents to workmen, the development of inland water ways and the preservation to the public of the forest and fuel lands remaining in the possession of the Government. Of the greatest importance, however, to the people of the whole country, are the President's remarks on an income tax and an inheritance tax, which The News prints in full below, space forbidding the publication of all of the two speeches. In regard to taxation, Mr. Roosevelt said:

"Most great civilized countries have an income tax and an inheritance tax. In my judgment both should be a part of our system of Federal taxation. I speak diffidently about the income tax, because one scheme for an income tax was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court by a five to five vote; and, in addition, it is a difficult tax to administer in its practical workings, and great care would have to be exercised to see that it is not evaded by the very man whom it is most desirable to have taxed, for if so evaded it would, of course, be worse than no tax at all, as the least desirable of all taxes is the tax which bears heavily upon the honest as compared with the dishonest man. Nevertheless, a graduated income tax of the proper type would be a desirable permanent feature of Federal taxation, and I still hope that one may be devised which the Supreme Court will declare constitutional.

"In my judgment, however, the inheritance tax is both a far better method of taxation, and far more important for the purpose I have in view—the purpose of having the swollen fortunes of the country bear in proportion to their size a constantly increasing burden of taxation. These fortunes exist solely because of the protection given the owners by the public. They are a constant source of care and anxiety to the public, and it is eminently just that they should be forced to pay heavily for the protection given them. It is, of course, elementary that the nation has the absolute right to decide as to the terms upon which any man shall receive a bequest or devise from another. We have repeatedly placed such laws on our statute books, and they have repeatedly been declared constitutional by the courts. I believe that the tax should contain the progressive principle. Whatever any individual receives, whether by gift, bequest or devise, in life or death, should, after a certain amount is reached, be increasingly burdened, and the rate of taxation should be increased in proportion to the remoteness of blood of the man receiving from the man giving or devising.

"The principle of this progressive taxation of inheritances has not only been authoritively recognized by the legislation of Congress, but it is now unequivocally adopted in the leading civilized nations of the world—in, for instance, Great Britain, France and Germany. Switzerland led off with the imposition of high progressive rates. Great Britain was the first of the great nations to follow suit, and within the last few years both France and Germany have adopted the principle. In Great Britian all estates worth $5,000 or less are practically exempt from death duties, while the increase is such that when the estate exceeds $5,000,000 in value and passes to a distant kinsman or stranger in blood the Government receives nearly 18 per cent.

"In France, under the progressive system, so much of an inheritance as exceeds $10,000,000 pays more than 20 per cent. to the state if it passes to a distant relative and 5 per cent. if it passes to a direct heir. In Germany very small inheritances are exempt, but the tax is so sharply progressive that an inheritance not in agricultural forest lands which exceeds $250,000,000, if it goes to distant relatives, is taxed at the rate of about 25 per cent.

"The German law is of special interest, because it makes the inheritance tax an imperial measure, while allotting to the individual states of the Empire a portion of the proceeds and permitting them to impose taxes in addition to those to imposed by the Imperial Government. In the United States the national Government has more than once imposed inheritance taxes in addition to those imposed by the States, and in the last instance about one-half of the States levied such taxes concurrently with the national Government, making a combined maximum rate in some cases as high as 25 per cent.; and, as a matter of fact, several States adopted inheritance tax laws for the first time while the national law was still in force and unrepealed.

"The French law has one feature which is to be heartily commended. The progressive principle is so applied that each higher rate is imposed only on the excess above the amount subject to the next lower rate. This plan is peculiarly adapted to the working out of the theory to using the inheritance tax for the purpose of limiting the size of inheritable fortunes, since the progressive increase in the rates, according to this mode, may be carried to its logical conclusion in a maximum rate of nearly 100 per cent. for the amount in excess of a special sum without being confiscatory as to the rest of the inheritance; for each increase in rate would apply only to the amount above a certain maximun.

"I do not believe that any advantage comes either to the country as the whole or to the individuals inheriting the money by permitting the transmission in their entirely of such enormous fortunes as have been accumulated in America. The tax could be made to bear more heavily upon persons residing out of the country than upon those residing within it. Such a heavy progressive tax is, of course, in no shape or way a tax on thrift or industry have ceased to possess any measurable importance in the acquistion of the swollen fortunes of which I speak long before the tax would in any way seriously affect them. Such a tax would be one of the methods by which we should try to preserve a measurable equality of opportunity for the people of the generation growing to manhood. As Lincoln pointed out, there are some respects in which men are obviously not equal; but there is no reason why there should not be an equality of self-respect and of mutual respect, an equality of rights before the law and at least an approximate equality in the condition under which each man obtains the chance to show the stuff that is in him when compared with his fellows."

THE COLDEST MAY IN A CENTURY.

The Past Month Holds the Record For a Period of 117 Years.

J. R. Elfreth, a well known resident of Delaware county, Pa., has a complete record of the weather for the last hundred and seventeen years, going back to 1790 which shows that with the exception of May of 1794, last month was the coldest May of which he had record, being even colder than the May of the famous cold year of 1816, when there was frost and ice every month in the year.

According to Mr Elfreth's reports last month was colder than the May of 1816 by ten degrees. The buds and small fruit froze on the trees, corn and beans had to be planted three or four times and crops were almost ruined. Farmers worked in the fields all summer with heavy coats and vests, and had to break the ice in watering troughs in the middie of July and August, as well as every other month in the year. The Mays of 1790, 1791 and 1792 were cold, with an average temperature of 66. 1805 was cold in May, with snow on the eight day. May in 1810, 1841, 1843, 1845, 1867, 1868, 1874, and 1884 was exceptionally cold, small fruits being destroyed by heavy frosts but with the exception of 1794, which was only half a degree colder, May of the present year holds the record for a hundred and seventeen years at least.—Connellsville Courier.

ORIGINAL FLAG IN NEW YORK.

How Star-Spangled Banner Was Lost To Maryland.

Mrs. George Livingston Baker of 6 Westervelt avenue, New Brighton, Staten Island, is authority for the statment that the Star-Spangled Banner which flew over Fort McHenry during its bombardment in the war of 1812 and inspired Francis Scott Key to the composition of the national ode is in this city. Mrs. Baker is the granddaughter of Col. George Armistead. The flag, she savs, is the property of Eben Appleton of this city, her brother, and has been deposited by him in the safe deposit vaults of a Broadwav trust company. Mrs Baker refused to give any more definite address for her brother or the name of the trust company. Her brother had been annoyed so much on account of his ownership of the flag, she said, that he wished his address and the place of deposit of the flag kept private.

"The flag came into the possession of my brother in this way: It was originally the property of the Government, of course. After the fort had been successfully defended against the British in the fight which prompted Francis Scott Key to the national ode, the Government presented the flag to Colonel Armistead in recongition of his conduct of the defence. He died soon after. Three months after his death his widow gave birth to a little girl, to whom the flag descended. She married William Stuart Appleton of the Boston family, who then went to Baltimore, her home, to live. My brother Eben and I are their only surviving children. On my mother's death the flag was left to Eben, and to me all the pictures and data concerning it.

"It was my brother's idea, for as a Southerner he is devoted to his State, to leave it to Maryland or one of its historical museums. But some years ago a number of men who were getting up a horse race in Pimlico, Maryland thought, they would like to have the flag at the race. They wrote my brother to this effect. When he replied expressing his surprise that they should ask for the flag for such a trifling use they boarded a train and came to my brother's house at a time most convenient. They had been drinking and the upshot of their visit to ask the loan of the flag was that they went away angry and my brother was so enraged at their lack of respect for the relic that he vowed the flag should never go to Maryland."

A Business Visit.

By ALICE LOUISE LEE.

Copyright, 1905, by Alice Louise Lee.

If thirty-five years of unmarried life entitle a woman to the sobriquet of "old maid," Elizabeth Fairchild could read her title clear, but of those other attributes supposed to mark an advanced state of single blessedness she possessed none.

She was sunny of disposition and met life with the optimism of girlhood. Within her bubbled a living spring of contentment which filled her deep eyes with happiness and made the smiles play about her lips as she worked in her little studio or wandered among the fields and woods back of Highlands.

By the little country town—where marriage was considered the early duty of the individual—she was regarded with great curiosity, and many were the speculations rife as to her probable "chances" during those years, when, as art student and teacher, she had been absent from home.

Being keenly aware of the attitude of her fellow citizens, her heart sank when a letter from Stanley Callaman briefly and abruptly announced that he would arrive at the Highlands the evening of Sept. 8 in order to discuss with her new designs for some decorated china he had ordered.

There was no hotel in the village, and she realized the painfulness of entertaining any man who was single and advanced in age without range of the eyes of Mrs. Bissell watching behind her blinds twenty feet from the east porch; of Mrs. Cavendish, twenty feet from the west bay window; of Mrs. Nash, just across the way, and of Lem Brown, the self constituted village wit, traveling past the front porch.

"Why, mother," exclaimed Elizabeth, half laughing, half frowning, "Highlands will have me engaged to him within an hour after his arrival!"

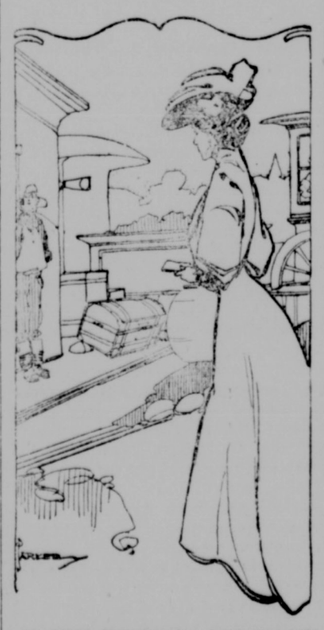
"What do you care," retorted Mrs. Fairchild, who was white haired, but fun loving still. "I'd like to see Lem Brown get his deserts for once."

"The probabilities are," Elizabeth told herself cheerily as she set her little studio in order the afternoon of the eighth, "that Mr. Callaman will see nothing and hear nothing which will betray the Highlands' matrimonial sentiments, and I can certainly endure the post comments for the sake of orders."

Whereupon she sang gayly and donned a becoming white dress and stylish black hat without at all realizing what a trim and attractive china decorator Mr. Callaman was destined to meet at the little country station.

Her acquaintance with him was brief and confined to an exchange of letters on the subject of painted china. A mutual acquaintance had induced him to give her the first order—the succeeding onces were given voluntarily and were oddly extensive for a bachelor.

The train was just pulling in when he arrived at the station, and the first unwelcome sight which met her eyes was Lem Brown, lounging on the platform, hands in pockets, his voice soaring above the clanking of the wheels



THE FIRST UNWELCOME SIGHT WAS LEM BROWN.

Presently his voice ceased, and its owner stared hard at a man with a suit case swinging himself down from the rear car, the sole passenger for the Highlands.

It was Stanley Callaman. Elizabeth recognized him by the description given her by their mutual friend—hair touched with gray, blue gray eyes and thin lips, which looked—this she noticed with shrinking—as though they could curl sarcastically, and shoulders broad enough to assist Atlas at his task with the world.

As she moved forward and extended her hand to the stranger Lem Brown's eyes bulged in his fleshy face. But when the two walked off together his feelings found vent in one audible, "Wonder of wonders—Lizzie Fairchild's got a beau!"

Elizabeth's cheeks flamed with mortification, and involuntarily the cordiality of the hostess was swallowed up in the conscious restraint of the woman, nor did she see at the corners of her guest's lips the lurking evidence that he understood the situation.

When they reached the Fairchild house she found a caller on the porch. The minister was there, an elderly and benevolent man who had fulfilled his duty to humanity by giving six daughters in marriage at tender ages. To him Elizabeth's state of single blessedness had long been a source of perplexity. Therefore when he saw her approach with a stranger, evidently a gentleman of proper age and dignity, his face shone with that peculiar indulgent, reminiscent expression with which age greets lovers.

Elizabeth recognized the look and swept up the steps and into the hall without pausing. With more haste than ease she dispatched Callaman to his room on the second floor, then turned and faced the minister, who had arisen and followed her, his little clerical joke all ready.

"Good evening, Miss Elizabeth," he said in a loud stage whisper intended to penetrate to the upper chamber. "I see by the signs that the preacher's services will be required later. Ha, ha!" With that he ambled down the steps.

Even Mrs. Fairchild, rocking on the porch, was vexed. "Land!" she exclaimed indignantly, "I hope that Boston man won't think you're being thrown at his head!"

Elizabeth made no reply as she departed to light up her studio, but her lips were pressed together, a red spot dyeing each cheek, and when Callaman entered the room a few moments later he was confronted by a formidable array of designs and by a woman bent on discussing business and business only.

Stubbornly, but unsuccessfully, he rebelled. In vain he directed the conversation longingly to the moon lighted porch—would he like the prevailing tints of the autumn leaves on the tea set red or yellow? His mind and speech wandered to a country drive in the evening light, but his scarlet tipped hostess, moving amid her work tall and straight, charming and inexorable, firmly interrupted—did he care for a continuous or broken design around the platter?

The task was not an easy one that Elizabeth had set for herself, and it was a weary head that she laid on her pillow that night. "I hope it rains tomorrow," was her last thought, "so that I may keep him in the studio and out of the reach of remarks." But fortune seemed at odds with her, for the morning dawned faultlessly clear.

After breakfast, when she would have led the way to the studio, Callaman ignored her lead and with, "What a glorious out of doors this place possesses," stepped out on the side porch. With a contraction of the heart Elizabeth followed and sat down facing the battery of Mrs. Bissell's green blinds, the slats of which were immediately moved gently to permit of reconnoissance of Mrs. Bissell's eyes.

With gentle firmness Elizabeth began again on the subject of painted china. "Mrs. Bissell shall be enlightened as to my visitor's mission," she told herself and slightly raised her clear voice that it might penetrate the green blinds.

Callaman's eyes smothered a laugh, and his lips twitched in a way which threatened an open rebellion against china, but Elizabeth did not notice. She was talking against time as recorded by the sitting room clock, a view of which her position commanded. And could wishes hasten time, the hands on that clock would have raced forward to train time—11 o'clock.

At 9:30 she heard Mrs. Bissell leave her house by way of the front door. "The worst is now over," she assured herself and drew a long breath of relief—premature relief she discovered the next moment when distant puffings and blowings announced that Mrs. Cavendish was laboring up the back steps for her morning call in the kitchen, and Elizabeth became apprehensive of conversational developments in that direction.

Her apprehensions were almost immediately justified as Mrs. Cavendish's asthmatic utterances were wafted through the vine draped kitchen window. "Dew tell! A man!" Then to Mrs. Fairchild in remonstrating accents: "Ann, you can't fool me on no chiny paintin'. He's here after Lizzie!"

Elizabeth felt the laughter in Callaman's eyes—her own were downcast and smarting—but she talked on bravely, unmindful of the fact that she had asked three times concerning the decorations of a chocolate pot her guest had purchased as a wedding gift. But when a few moments later she arose, announcing it was time to start for the station, and he, surreptitiously examining his watch, found it lacked an hour of train time, his lips tightened and his eyes sobered.

As they emerged from the house the Highlands almost to a man gave them a mute reception. The postmaster, barber, butcher, blacksmith and merchant promptly, as though notified by wireless telegraphy, appeared at the doors of their respective establishments and frankly stared. The women, more discreet, peered from behind their curtains.

Callaman had some difficulty in accommodating his pace to Elizabeth's flying footsteps as she hurried up the street and turned into the pleasant, shady retreat afforded by the bicycle path, which was a short cut to the station. Here she still forged ahead, silent, having reached a state where the anguish of mortification had deprived her of the power of speech.

Suddenly Callaman stopped short beside a big rock overlooking the station and plumped his suit case down. "Miss Fairchild," he began vigorously, "I protest!"

Elizabeth relaxed her speed. She turned and looked back in surprise. Callaman had deliberately seated himself on the rock, pushed his hat on the back of his head and was mopping his face. The lines about his mouth were conspicuously firm as he snapped open his watch.

"It's now only 10:15. That train isn't due for three-quarters of an hour, and here we are so near the station that I could throw my baggage down on the platform. I feel like throwing what's more!" he added, glancing up with amusement simmering in the puckers about the corners of his eyes. "Now I intend to sit right here and protest against your treatment of me."

"My treatment of you!" repeated Elizabeth faintly, shivering and flushing at the recollection of the past few hours.

Callaman considerately occupied himself with brushing the rock beside him.

"MISS FAIRCHILD," HE BEGAN VIGOROUSLY, "I PROTEST!"

"You better sit down here," he remarked calmly, leaning back easily against a tree trunk, "because I have no intention of allowing you to dispose of me as you intended to."

Elizabeth sat down in confusion. "I didn't intend to—to dispose of you," she stammered, with downcast eyes, which confessed her guilt.

"Oh, yes, you did! You intended to take me down to that station at express speed and leave me there. Yes, you did"—in answer to a slight shake of her head. "You had the plot all laid and was carrying it out at the rate of half a mile a minute!"

There was an instant's silence, during which Elizabeth, leaning over her side of the rock, examined some moss attentively. Suddenly her shoulders began to shake. The ludicrousness of the situation was taking possession of her. A faint sound of laughter reached the tree trunk. It acted like a spark in a powder magazine, and with a burst all the laughter which Callaman had been repressing rang forth.

They laughed until the tears came. Then they wiped their eyes, looked at each other and laughed again. Elizabeth felt that the cobwebs had been swept away from her eyes, and she could look at her guest for the first time in an open, friendly fashion.

"I wanted to tell you down at the station last night not to mind," Callaman began, "but I didn't dare. I'm sorry to be the cause of so much annoyance to you—and gratification to the minister, that good old duffer." Here he went off again sending out peal after peal of laughter.

And Elizabeth, happy at being herself again, joined him. "I was afraid you wouldn't understand," she said at last, "not being familiar with the matrimonial sentiments of our village."

"Understand!" he interrupted heartily. "Of course I understand. I was brought up in a little Connecticut town where every man is considered marriageable at twenty. Luckily," with a sidewise glance, "I left before that time and so must answer for the crime of bachelorhood."

Elizabeth drew a long breath. "I thought there was no place as openly addicted to matrimony as the Highlands."

Callaman stooped to adjust a strap on his suit case. "No town has a monopoly on that business, I believe," he said drily. "I've known ideas anent it to penetrate to—well, we'll say a Boston apartment."

The whistle of the express sounded far up the track. Callaman arose and picked up his suit case. Then he peered over the rock down on the station. "There's our friend the minister waiting to see me off," he chuckled, "and the fat man who placed me so readily on my arrival last night!"

An expression of annoyance passed over Elizabeth's face. "They must have something to talk about, I suppose," she said resignedly.

For a moment the two walked down the path together in silence. Then Callaman began soberly, "Miss Fairchild, I should very much enjoy giving those people something worth talking about."

Elizabeth innocently fell into the trap. "How?" she asked, glancing up with a smile.

His tone was earnest despite the quizzical pucker at the corners of his mouth. "By visiting you again in—say, December—not to discuss china! May I come?"

Elizabeth caught her breath. She glanced into the blue gray eyes meeting hers in deep questioning and replied simply, "Yes."

A JUDICIAL WARNING.

Justice Brewer of United States Supreme Court on Public Ownership.

There is this important difference between public and private indebtedness: The individual may mortgage his home or other property, and if the purpose for which the mortgage is given proves a failure the property may be lost to him, and on his death his heirs simply receive so much less than they otherwise would, but the indebtedness casts no burden upon them. It may wipe out his entire property and they receive nothing. To that extent they may suffer if a failure to inherit property can be called suffering. But public indebtedness is of a different character. It does not wipe out property now existing, but it casts a burden upon the industries and toil of those who come after us. Interest and principal are met by taxes, and taxes continue from age to age until the debt is paid. They who come after us, who may receive little or no benefit from the debt, are called upon to contribute the proceeds of their labor to its payment. In other words, while private indebtedness does not mortgage or incumber future industry and labor, public indebtedness does. And in piling up public indebtedness we too often forget that the future will have its burdens—that there will be demands upon it for expenditures. Improvements and conveniences corresponding to the life of that day will be needed. So that there is injustice in creating a public indebtedness for improvements which will be mainly available in our day and only to a slight degree of benefit to those who come after us. Indeed, generally speaking, it is fair to leave each generation to determine what amount of public burdens it will assume, and each should take care of its own public indebtedness.—Leslie's Weekly.

FUNCTIONS OF THE STATE.

Interesting Analysis Made by Bishop Stang of Fall River.

In a recent address in St. Mary's cathedral Bishop Stang of Fall River thus analyzed the functions of the state:

"The state should not absorb the rights of individuals, but should keep them inviolate unless they clash with the common good and the interests of others. The proper office of the government is to foster public well being and private prosperity by maintaining peace and good order, safeguarding family life, respecting religion and punishing evil doers.

"Civil authority may step in to interfere if through strikes there is imminent danger of disturbance to the public peace, if in workshops and factories there is danger to morals through the mixing of sexes or from any occasion of evil, if the health of laborers is endangered by excessive work or the want of sanitary arrangements or if labor is unsuited to sex or age, but the state should not intervene or meddle with private concerns any further than is required for the remedy of the evil or the removal of the danger. The state should not only protect private ownership as something sacred and inviolable, but its policy should be to induce as many people as possible to become owners. The possessor of the poorest cabin will not change it for the dreams of a socialistic paradise."

A PUBLIC OWNERSHIP PERIL.

It Would Intrench Corrupt Political Bosses Permanently In Power.

Referring to the recent announcement that 51,146 persons are on the payroll of New York city, the Newark Advertiser declares that in the event of municipal ownership of street railways, electric light and gas plants, ferries and other public utilities the city employees would constitute a political army that would make a change of administration impossible.

It recalls the fact that 25,000 city employees in Philadelphia kept Philadelphia in the hands of the corrupt Durham machine for years and only a great popular uprising finally overthrew the grafters.

"If Durham had had control of the street railroads and other public utilities in Philadelphia through municipal ownership," it observes, "he could have laughed at popular uprisings. He would have been as absolute in his authority as the czar."

The point is well taken.

In other cities the political situation under public ownership would be as it would in Philadelphia and New York.

Bosses may be overthrown and grafters turned out whenever the people will it at present. Public ownership of all public utilities would end this. It would bind the people hand and foot and deliver them into the hands of political grafters.—Long Branch (N. J.) Record.

When Tom's Tune Would Change.

Of course municipal ownership would be liked by any political boss who owns a city, as Tom Johnson owns Cleveland. Just think of what a tremendous increase of political power could be given to him were about 25,000 or more men to be added to the city payroll! How Tom as an "out" would like to be a candidate for mayor against such official backed by the support of an army of paid retainers!

He would like it and favor it just about as much as he liked or favored three cent fare or municipal ownership of street railways when he was managing and owning street railways.—Mansfield (O.) News.

To insist that governmental ownership is necessary to guard against abuses is to confess a degree of impotency which is a libel on our form of government. — Vice President Fairbanks.

A CONTRAST OF THE LAW.

Two very striking examples of the absurdities of the action of modern and civilized law by which the gigantic infraction of the intent of the law goes unpunished while the small offender who is not able to employ able counsel to dodge its provisions by technicalities meets with a summary fate, is drawn by the Pittsburg Dispatch in which it says:

"The explanations of the reasons why it has been decided that it is inadvisable and in a legal sense probably impossible to punish E. H. Harriman for his operations have bee set forth with some profuseness. It is not necessary to recount them at length. Their summary is that a wholesale operation for the emission of flat securities, and violation of enactments for corporate regulation, can, if he fortifies himself with certain forms and devices suggested by highpriced counsel, go unpunised for the unquestioned infraction of the intent of the law.

We have no purpose of disputing that this is correct in the theories and ruling of law. But does that fact that it is the product of the established system of law suggest nothing to the reflection of the puble, and especially to lawyers with a conception of the purpose of law to establish practical justice? Especially does the grotesqueness of privileged and legal corporate plunder shine out when it is recalled that almost simultaneously with this conclusion came the conviction and sending to jail of a New York scrubwoman for appropriating to her own ablutions a cake of soap of the value of 5 cents, the propperty of the United States Express Company.

Dogberry loudly called upon his associate to write him down an ass; but it hardly seems that modern and civilized law need improve on his example to the effect of writing itself down that way."

SCHLEY'S SPEECH.

"If you we should ever fail to get men to defend this country," said Rear Admiral Winfield Scott Schley to more than 6,000 public school children, at a reception the other day, "I notice by the marching here this afternoon that we can enlist the girls; and if it ever comes to that, we will surly lick the enemy with broomsticks."

The occasion was the conferring of the order of the Temple, the final degree of the Order of Knights Templar, upon several candidates.

The army of children cheered the governor and called for Schley. As he waived his hand they quieted. Admiral Schley said:

My Dear Children—I want to say at the very outset that I thank you very much for this demonstration. I was never happier in my life than when I saw you gathering here waving the flags. My sentiments to you chilaren of Allentown, is best expressed in the old nursery rhyme:

The rose is red, the violet blue,
Sugar is sweet, and so are you.

The yell that went up as Admiral Schley said this was something terrific After the cheering had died out he continued:

I want to say further that I have observed here today that the men of Pennsylvania like those of the rest of the country, are full of push and purpose, the boys are filled with noise and nerve, and as for the girls, they are the happiest combinatian in the world of beauty and brains. To be welcomed in your midst by this combination is an honor of which any man might feel proud, and it is one that I certainly appreciate. If I had a chance I should be delighted to shake every one of you by the hand. God bless you children!—Allentown Correspondent Philadelphia Record.

A Little Printer's Ink Makes Millions Think—Think—Think!

More truth than poetry. A little Printer's Ink prints a little advertisement in a little "magazine" that circulates at a little price and goes into a million little homes, chiefly in the little cities and towns and country places.

The millions of people in these homes are caused by the Printer's Ink to think that they can get big bargains for their money by sending it away by mail, ordering the things advertised by the little pinch of Printer's Ink.

Sometimes when they receive the stuff they order by mail they have another Think coming. They think, "What fools we mortals be," and apply the Think to themselves.

And sometimes some of them think something like this:

"Wonder why Mister Man, our local dealer in many things we need, doesn't advertise these things in our local paper? Maybe if he did we wouldn't be tempted to send to the big city for these same things. If we were sure we could buy them at home for about the same price and have a chance to see the goods before taking, we think we'd prefer to buy them at home."

Now, Mister Man, what do you think—think—think?

CONCLUSION: THERE'S PLENTY OF PRINTER'S INK IN THIS NEWSPAPER SHOP.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

All readers of this paper intending to attend the Student Conference June 23-30, at Mountain Lake Park, are invited to the Reception this Saturday evening at 8 o'clock, in the Hall of Philosophy.

Mr. Hickman, who purchased the Sheets cottage on G street, is now, with his family, occupying the cottage.

You want to hear Dr. S. C. Sweet on "The Greatest Miracle of the Ages," at Mountain Lake Park this Sunday morning.

Among recent arrivals for the season we note the following: The Wheatleys, to Fern cottage; Mrs. Cunningham, to Corpenter cottage on F street, Miss Etta Springer, to Walton Home; Mrs. Judge Haymond, to Enlow cottage on F street; Mr. Hartman and family, to the Conner cottage; Mr. Selby and family, to the Tallson cottage; Hamiltons, of Fairmont, to the Rathbun cottage; Fultons, to their cottage on Oakland avenue; Mrs. Hull to her cottage on E street.

Recognition service at 3.30 p. m. this Sunday in the Hall of Philosophy, will be of special interest to all Christian workers.

Mrs. J. A. Enlow and part of her family arrived Tuesday and are in the Rembold cottage. The other members of the family are detained at school in Cumberland.

No greater array of talent has ever been presented to this community in the same length of time than is given in the Student Conference program June 23-30.

Mr. Wm. Malette and family are now at their summer home opposite the Association office.

Programs and Registration Cards for the Student Conference will be at both Banks and Drug Stores for the convenience of the Oakland patrons.

Dr. B. Frank Laughlin and bride arrived at the Park Wednesday direct from Atlantic City, where they spent most of their honeymoon.

Hon. George L. Wellington will be the lecturer for Monday evening, June 24. He will give his great lecture on Martin Luther.

The new postoffice building is receiving the finishing touches. The postoffice will be moved into its new quarters next week, and Messrs. King & Martin will welcome their patrons and friends in their handsome new store room about the last of next week.

"The Park never looked so well," is the unanimous verdict of all.

All persons driving to the Park will find hitching places for their horses between D and E streets or just one square farther west than the old hitching place. Street lights are at each end of this lot.

Registration cards and single admission tickets for the Student Conference will be on sale at the Association Office.

With its Jubilee year Mountain Lake Park offers a new factor in the upbuilding of His Kingdom to be known as the Mountain Lake Park Students Conference which will be for all students of the bible and others interested.

The purposes of the Conference is to deepen the spiritual life of all who attend, to quicken a deeper interest in Missions, and to send forth an army of the Lord's own fully equipped for aggressive work for Christ.

The Platform for 1907 will consist of Dr. Harris E. Kirk, of Baltimore, who will give daily explanations of the Word; Dr. S. C. Sweet, of China, a Baptist Missionary having great success in this wonderful mission field, will speak daily on China, thus giving all mission student class members an opportunity to get a forecast of next year's work; Dr. Charles Roads one of the leading Sunday School workers of the country and Superintendent for the State of Maryland, will speak daily to the Sunday School workers. Besides these Rev. Dr. Wedderspoon of Pittsburg, Rev. T. E. Cramblet, President of Bethany College, Hon. Joshua Levering, Rev. Dr. W. L. Davidson of Chautauqua fame, and others of summit ability will be heard during the Conference.

Pastors, Sunday School workers, members of Mission Study Classes, Young People's Societies, Students in Colleges, Academies, Normal or High Schools will find in this conference a rare opportunity for the study of Him and His.

Saturday, June 22, a Reception by the Executive Committee to all residents of the Park and vicinity, all members and others interested will open the Conference. Sunday, June 23, will bring a rich treat in sermons by Drs. Sweet and Davidson. The afternoon will be a Recognition Service for all those who who have entered the Kingdom within the past year.

Beginning with Monday, June 24, and continuing until Saturday, June 29, Dr. Kirk, one of the most attractive expounders of the Word; Dr. Sweet, eminently qualified to tell the Story of China and its people, and Dr. Charles Roads, the Sunday School Specialist, will speak daily to all Christian workers present.

More than 40 prominent educators or college presidents and many christian workers have consented to serve on the advisory board. The Registration Fee for the entire Conference will be the nominal amount of $1.00, or less than three (3) cent for every address.

FIKE.

The wheat in our section is very late, it being at least one month behind the usual time. The corn is not all up yet at this writing.

Mr. Roy Chisholm has moved on the farm he bought of Mr. John H. Thomas recently.

A short time ago we had something unusual to happen, it was that Mr. Francis Fike traded a turkey gobbler for a cow even. Now this seems unlikely, but it is true.

I think our vicinity can break the record for having the oldest chicken in Garrett county for Mrs. Roy Chisholm has a chicken that is 15 years old.

Mr. Hollinger, of Mill Run, is moving his saw mill on Glade Run where he will shortly commence sawing.

Mr. A. C. Sines, of Awman, was in this section on Sunday last.

The writer understands that Mr. Jasper C. Meyers, one of the Garrett county school teachers, lost the suit that was brought against him for correcting one of his pupils last winter. I would say that Mr. Meyers has the sympathy of all the teachers in this section. What will the teachers do with unruly pupils if they are not allowed to correct them? Will some one please tell me through the paper what a teacher is to do under such circumstances.

Wm. H. Thomas was in Markleysburg, Pa., one day last week.

Mr. John H. Thomas is going to leave the farm as soon as he can arrange to have a public sale.

CARTER.

E. L. Officers Elected.

At the meeting of the Swanton Epworth League last Sunday night the following persons were elected as officers of the League: President, W. W. Sweet; first vice president, Mrs. S. M. Fairall; second vice president, Matthias Barker; third vice president, Mrs Stella McRobie; fourth vice president, Miss Carrie Lee; secretary, Mrs. E. Pearle Swietzer; treasurer, Miss Carrie Mosser ushers, Mr. J. W. McRobie and Mr. Oliver Sweitzer.

The meeting on Sunday night was well attended and very interesting.

PEARLE SWEITZER.

A Comparison.

"Some years ago, I used

Davis' 100 per cent Pure Paint

on my home, at the same time, several other houses near me were painted with other paints. There is a big contrast today between the appearance of my house and others." J. H. PRUITT, Chincoteague, Va.

If you compare adulterated paint with Davis 100 per cent Pure, you will readily know why my house painted with Davis looks well and wears well.

The young man left quite an impression upon his auditors and has been engaged to preach at that point every Sunday during his summer vacation.

The day of union church work is approaching slowly but surely. The Cumberland and regular Presbyterian churches have gotten together on common ground and there is fair prospects for the two Methodist churches coming together. A move is on foot to unite the Baptist and Christian churches. It begins to look favorable for the realization of a long drawn out dream.

The citizens of any prosperous town are always public spirited and united. Stand together, work for the interests of the whole town. Always stand ready to do your part. Don't grumble and spend your time in prophesying failures, but help to make every enterprise a success, be it great or small. Be energetic and enterprising and your example will be imitated.

There is a great deal in writing an attractive advertisement. Do you give your advertisement your best attention? If you expect to do a large business on the fact that you know so many people, you will get left. The ones you don't know are in the great majority. How are you to reach them in the most favorable manner at the least expense? By placing an attracive advertisement in the newspaper.

Miss Irene Haulenbeek returned from a visit to Englewood, New Jersey, a suburb of New York City, on Monday. The twentieth wedding anniversary of her cousin, Mrs. E. Mr. E. A. Heinrichs, of New York, is the Deer Park hotel storekeeper. He has acted in this capacity there for ten seasons. During the winter, he takes a trip to the Pacific coast, and when San Francisco was ravaged by the deadly earthquake he was one of the visitors and suffered by the visitation. He says this thing of escaping from a dwelling that is toppling over from the effects of an earthquake, is really a serions matter.

At the commencement exercises of the Ohio Wesleyan University at Delaware, Ohio, on Thursday, Charles A. Jones, son of Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Jones, of Deer Park, graduated with the degree of B. A., being one of a class of 131, 52 of whom received the classical degree. Mr. Jones was one of eleven members to receive cum laude, or honors, in general scholarship, and one of two to receive high honors in the department of Economics and Government. The thesis which he submitted for the last honor outlined the development of county lines in the state of Ohio from its earliest organization to the present time, and was accompanied by twenty original maps. Mr. Jones was one of four men to receive the pin, which is the high journalistic award of the University. He expects to enter newspaper work as a profession, and becomes city editor of the Delaware Gazette with the opening of next week. The class of which he was a member is the most notable one, both in scholarship and general ability, which the University has graduated in many years.

RELEASED FROM A MASS OF COAL.

Remarkable Discovery Made by Late Anthony Reese in a Barton Mine.

The lamented Anthony Reese had one remarkable experience during his coal mining days. When he was a young man he worked in a mine near Barton, and one day while digging coal a mile under ground his pick cut into a small pocket in the coal, and he was astonished to see two bats fly out of the hole and circle around the mine. Mr. Reese caught the bats and took them home. The next day one was gone and strange to say, found its way back to the mine, where it was recaptured.

The bats lived only a few days and were sent to the Smithsonian Institute where they were pronounced "antediluvian bats," the claim being made that they had escaped the deluge. The incident was given much space in the newspapers and magazines at that time, and John W. Young, the present clerk of the county court, who lived at that time near where the bats were found, says that the imprint of the bats were in the pocket that had encased them.

The bats were much larger and of a different color from the bats of the present day. Mr. Reese often talked of the strange incident in his life, and was proud of the fact that he was once a coal digger and discovered the only antediluvian animals even seen alive by modern mortals.—George's Creek Press.

THE DEATH RECORD.

LEVI SWEITZER.

At his residence, about one mile north of Swanton, in the early morning of Sunday, June 9th, 1907, Mr. Levi Sweitzer died in the 88th year of his age. The end came less from encroachments of disease than from forces enfeebled under the burden of age. For more than a year life with him has been in a delicate balance and at most any hour a fatal turn of the scale would have created no surprise. In fact, during the last year the picture has been full of pathos, this aged man and his aged wife daily waiting the final summons with chances of survival almost daily alternating between the two, and when his came her approach was too close upon the border line to clearly understand his departure in her advance. Mr. Sweitzer was a citizen of a blameless record, sober, industrious and of an amiable nature. He lived consistently in the communion of the Lutheran church and was buried under its rites reverentially administered by the Rev. J. B. Shoup of that religious persuasion, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Johnson, of the U. B. church, in the presence of a large concourse of relatives and friends at Swanton. He is survived by a widow and a large family of grown sons and daughters, and, it is stated, that his descendents, running into the third generation, number about 150. In his quiet walk of peace through this lengthened span of life the God he served was his "exceeding great reward," and conscious of this he was willing to pursue the journey even "as a stranger and a pilgrim on the earth."

RELLIM.

MRS. WORKMAN.

Died, yesterday, near Huntington, W. Va., Mrs. Workman, the mother of Rev. J. B. Workman, of Oakland.

MRS. J. H. MANOWN.

In Baltimore on Tuesday last at the home of her son, Mrs. J. H. Manown, wife of Dr. J. H. Manown, well known in Oakland where she resided a numder of years ago. Her funeral took place in Kingwood on Sunday.

COL. R. W. MONROE.

At Kingwood, W. Va., on last Friday morning, very suddenly, Col. Robert W. Monore, age about seventy-five years. The deceased gentleman was a highly respected citizen of that town and was quite well known by many Oakland people.

Mrs. J. H. Freeland and Mrs. John Spiker, both of Terra Alta, were in Oakland this morning shopping.

Mr. A. V. Cuppett, a popular salesman in the Loar & Poe store, had as his guests for a few hours last evening his father, Mr. Thos. H. Cuppet, his brother, Mr. H. N. Cuppett and Rev. and Mrs. J. H. Enlow all from Oakland and vicinity. Mrs. Enlow is a sister to Mr. Cuppett. They had all been to Buckhannon, attending the commencement exercise, and in which institution of learning Mr. H. N. Cuppett is a student. The party left on train No. 4 for their homes.

There are too many boys and girls in the country and city, more in the latter than the former, who are prone to look upon work as beneath them. There are thousands of them on the threshold of maturity who retain the same views and habits which found encouragement in their earlier years. What becomes of this class of people? Some of them awaken and after a desperate struggle overcome the habit and learn to work, to save, and to prepare for the inevitable rainy day. Many of them however, drift and drift until they become acceptable recruits in the hobo army. Then they speedily reach the conclusion that things are mighty unequal in this world; that the advantages are all with the rich, and that a poor man has no show.

TO DEBATE ON BAPTISM.

Rev. H. C. Salem and Rev. V. W. Wallace will Discuss The Question.

From Revs. H. C. Salem, of the Friendsvillle Luthhran church, and V. W. Wallace, of the Friendsville Disciple church, the following communication, which is self explanatory has been received with the request that it be given publicity through the columns of The Republican:

OFFICIAL NOTICE.

This is to notify the public that a discussion of the following proposition will be made:

"Nothing else is valid bible baptism but the single immersion of the candidate entirely under water, by the adminisrator, according to the doctrine of the Disciple church."

Upon this proposition Rev. V. W. Wallace of the Disciple church, Confluence. Pa., will take the affirmative, aud Rev. H. C. Salem, of the Friendsville Lutheran church, will be his opponent. The debate will be held in Allen's Hall at Friendsville, beginning on Monday evening, June 24th, at 8 o'oclock, will continue for five evenings. Each speaker, under the terms of the agreement governing the discussion of the proposition, will be allowed two speeches of thirty minutes' duration each evening. A small admission fee will be charged to cover expenses.

The debate will be based upon the following language (except the word "backward" has been stricken out by mutual constent) and rules:

Friendsville, Md., April 3, 1907.

Rev. Wallace, Friendsville, Md.,

Dear Sir and Brother:—I have learned that you have challenged the whole world to talk with you on baptism, or any minister. I hereby notify you that I this day accept your challenge to debate the question with you. As the challenged party has the right to frame the proposition, I submit the following: "Nothing else is valid bible baptism but the single immersion of the candidate entirely under water, backward by the administrator, according to the doctrine of the Disciple church." I consider the above a very fair proposition.

The challenged party having the right to select weapons, I choose the entird Word of God only, all human tradiions and opinions of men to be barred. This would carry out your principle that you take only the bible for authority. I however, lay down these rules for debating with you:

1. That freedom of speech shall be guaranteed to each speaker, but each speaker must confine himself strictly to the wording of the proposition.

2. That a stenographer who shall be neither Lutheran or Disciple, be employed to take an exact account of the debate which debate shall afterwards published at the joint expense of the speakers, who shall also bear jointly the expenses of the stenographer.

3. That neither speaker shall be interrupted by the other while he is speaking, except by consent of a majority of the moderators when they shall decide that he is off the question.

4. That each speaker shall choose a moderator and these two shall choose a third, who must be acceptable to the speakers.

5. That the debate must be free from personalties.

6. That a reasonable length of time be allowed to advertise the debate before it takes place.

ALTAMONT.

Judging from the past few days, we are inclined to believe summer is coming this way at last, which should be very encouraging to all as the weather for some time has been very much to the farmers' disadvantage in general, but all that is necessary is persevere and trust in Providence.

Mr. H. A. Schmidt and wife spent last week at the county seat courting.

Mrs. James Paugh, living near Mt. Lake Park, was the guest of Mrs. A. M. Jefferys last weak.

Mr. Jacob Carter spent Sunday at home, returning Monday to Beckman where he is employed as a carpenter.

Mr. John Rexrode, the champion eagle hunter, spent last week at home.

Mr. Herman Beckman made a business trip to Oakland on Monday.

Miss May McRobie, who has been at Blaine for several months, is visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Francis McRobie, at this writing.

Miss Pleasant Sullivan is visiting friends and relatives at Bloomington.

Mr. Richard Matthew, of Youngstown, Ohio, is the guest of his brother, E. Matthew of this place.

Mrs. John C. Beckman was the guest of her daughter, Mrs. Matthew, a few days last week.

Mrs. Acy Day, who has been very ill for some time, is very much improved.

Miss Mattie Jackson is very ill at this time with erysipelas. Dr. Cole, of Deer Park, is her attending physician.

Prof. Groves is having very interesting singing school at this place Tuesday and Thursday nights of each week.

Mrs. Mattie Carter is on the sick list at this writing.

Mr. N. B. Spiker, employed at Beckman mines, is home for a few days the guest of his mother.

Mr. Lake Wright was at Oakland on business Wednesday. On his return he discovered he was minis his grip. The finder will be liberally rewarded by returning with contents of the same to the owner

Mr. Richard Roy spent most of last week attending court at Oakland. Mr. Gay Hayden, of Mt. Lake Park, looked after the business at this place during his absence.

The new Sunday passenger train which is scheduled between Deer Park and Fairmont comes to this place to turn and remains here until time for departure in the evening.

Mrs. Chadderton, widow of W. H. Chadderton, was visiting at Mr. Herman Beckman's Sunday.

Mr. Ashby, lumber man of Oakland, was here on business Friday of last week.

Miss Ethel and Master James Comp are visiting their grand parents, Mr. and Mrs. M. Barker, at Swanton.

Mrs. Mary Spiker was dining with friends in Guinea Hollow one day last week.

Mr. Dude Tasker, one of Mr. Roy's ex-clerks, is taking his second term of music lessons under direction of Prof. Groves.

Mr. W. S. Upole was at Oakland on business Tuesday of this week.

Mr. Chas. Bernard passed through our village Sunday en route to Deer Park. He drove a nice pair of grays that is hard to beat.

Mrs. John Wright and daughter Miss Della were pleasant callers at Mrs. Mattie Jackson's on Monday evening.

SELDOM SEEN.

I will mail you free, to prove merit, samples of my Dr. Shoop's Restorative and my Book on either Dyspepsia, The Heart or The Kidneys. Troubles of the Stomach, Heart or Kidneys, are merely Simptoms of a deeper aliment. Don't make the commen error of treating the symptoms only. Symptom treatment is treating the result of your ailment, and not the cause. Weak Stomach nerves—the inside nerves—mean Stomach weakness, always. And the Heart, and Kidneys as well, have their controlling or inside nervs. Weaken these nerves, and you inevitably have weak vital organs. Here is where Dr. Shoop's Restorative has its fame. No other remedy even claims to treat the "inside nerves." Also for bloating, biliousness, bad breath or complexion, use Dr. Shoop's Restorative. Write me to-day for sample and free Book. Dr. Shoop, Racine, Wis. The Restorative is sold by all dealers.

THANKS TO THE METER.

By James Clegg.

Copyright, 1907, by M. M. Cunningham.

"Please, have you a quarter?"

The girl from across the hall held out a tiny hand, in the palm of which were displayed three nickels and a dime.

Keenly conscious that there was a hole, a most comfortable and satisfactory hole, in the elbow of his smoking jacket, Digby held out his own hand, unclosing his fingers to display the desired coin.

"Did you know what I was coming after?" she said, with a laugh. Digby had never heard her laugh before. It was a low, rippling laugh, almost as attractive as her smile. He wondered how he could improve his opportunity. Ever since she had moved in he had wanted to know the girl across the hall. Had his mother been home it would have been all simpler, but he had been keeping bachelor hall for nearly three months.

"Did you know I wanted the quarter?" she repeated. Digby pulled himself together.

"I am a seventh son," he declared solemnly. "I know that you want the quarter. I can see you returning to your apartment. I can see you climbing on a chair and dropping the coin into the gas meter. I can see the light growing bright again. Great is the automatic meter—when you have a quarter."

"Yes, when!" she cried. "The other day we only had a check, and no one could cash it."

"Say no more," he commanded tragically. "I know the rest."

"I'm very much obliged," she said gratefully. "You are sure you won't need one?"

"Not at all," he assured. As though to prove him false the gas in his hall grew dim. "I have more change," he explained, "and it's all right."

He watched her regretfully as she slipped back into her own apartment. He had planned many brilliant encounters in which he would hold her enthralled by his wit, and they would live happily ever after. Instead he had never been so dull, and perhaps he had lost his chance.

"IT WAS AWFULLY BRAVE OF YOU, BEN," SHE WHISPERED.

The gas had gone out as he closed the door and limped into the kitchen. He knew very well that it was useless to search for a quarter. He had found the one he had just given up only after a search. He would have to fall back on candles. There were half a dozen in the dining room, and by lighting four he managed to read after a fashion.

But he had scarcely settled himself to his reading when the doorbell rang again. He wondered who it might be now as he made his way down the dark hall. The girl across the hall stood there again.

"You fibbed," she said reproachfully. "You said you had another quarter for yourself. You let me drop yours in our meter, and we can see across the shaft that you're using candles."

"I rather like them," he assured, but she would have none of it.

"You were just going to drop the coin in your meter," she cried. "That is why you had it in your hand."

In the face of deduction he was dumb. The girl went on:

"I know you can't go downstairs to get change because you hurt your ankle. It wouldn't be any use anyway. It's Sunday, and only the drug store is open, and they are all out of quarters. I was down there just before I asked you for one. Mother says you must come in to our flat and read. You may smoke all you like. We don't mind it in the least.'

"I am very comfortable," he protested.

The opportunity he had longed for had come, and he was too bashful to avail himself of it. In the end the girl in her masterful little way carried her point. Presently he was installed in the pleasant parlor and was telling motherly Mrs. Fallows all about his trials without his mother.

"It must be so lonesome for you," she cried. "Why didn't you come to us long ago?"

"I've wanted to," he admitted frankly. "Sometimes I've seen the light, and I've been so homesick. We only moved here just before my grandmother's illness took mother west, and I never got acquainted with any one. All of our friends live on the other side of town."

"We come from the country, where we are used to being neighborly," she explained. "I want you to feel that you are welcome here any time."

There was a sincerity in her tones that brought a genial glow to Digby's heart, and the girl (he knew now her name was Ethel) seconded her mother with a glance.

That night was but the beginning of a new life for Digby. The following evening he brought home a box of candy as a return courtesy and was invited to spend the evening, so gradually he fell into the habit of dropping in after dinner. There were trips to the theater, little excursions on Sunday, and even when he had word from his mother that she had decided to remain west for the summer he did not offer objection.

The more he was with Ethel the more deeply in love he became. He had never known many women, and this charming girl was the first he had ever loved. Often he would declare to himself that he would propose, but each time his courage failed him.

Then one night came the climax. The gas began to flicker and burn low, and Ethel left the room to drop in the coin that would turn on the flow again. He heard a match strike in the kitchen, where the gas had not been lit, then came an explosion, and he rushed down the narrow hall.

In some fashion the meter had sprung a leak, and the lighted match had caused the ignition of the gas. Ethel, her light gown ablaze, came staggering blindly toward him. He had his coat off before they met and threw it about her shoulders, forcing her to the carpet that the blaze might not be able to gain headway toward her face. The gas in the apartment had been extinguished, and he was forced to work in the dark, but he beat out the flames with his hand and then rushed into the kitchen to check the flow of gas.

It was easy to extinguish the flames there and shut off the gas at the inlet. Then he opened the doors from their apartment to his and bore her in his arms to his mother's room. Mrs. Fallows followed and took charge of the girl while he went for the doctor.

It was some hours later that he was permitted to see Ethel. She had asked for him, her mother said, and he stole gently into the room. She put out her uninjured hand and smiled up at him. In some miraculous fashion her face had not been touched by the flames, though her masses of golden hair were crisp and blackened.

"It was awfully brave of you, Ben," she whispered as he bent over her. "When that explosion came the first thing I thought was that I was so glad that you were there. I knew you would help me. The doctor says you saved my life by putting the fire out so quickly."

"Any one could have done it," he protested, "but I'm glad it was I."

"So am I," she answered.

"I'd like to be around all the time, if you'll let me," he went on in sudden bravery.

"I was afraid you were getting to look on me more as a sister," she said as the blood came slowly into her cheeks. "Are you sure, Ben, that it's not just because of the accident?"

"The accident has nothing to do with it," he protested, "except that the thought of how I might have lost you gave me the courage to speak."

"I think," she smiled faintly, "that we ought to be very grateful to that gas meter. That's how I first met you, you remember."

History of Ivory.

The earliest recorded history—we might say prehistoric, the hieroglyphical—that has come down to us has been in carvings on ivory and bone. Long before metallurgy was known among the prehistoric races carvings on reindeer horn and mammoth tusk evidence the antiquity of the art. Fragments of horn and ivory engraved with excellent pictures of animals have been found in caves and beds of rivers and lakes. There are specimens in the British museum, also in the Louvre, of the Egyptian skill in ivory carving attributed to the age of Moses. In the latter collection are chairs or seats of the sixteenth century B. C. inlaid with ivory and other pieces of the eleventh century B. C. Carving of the "precious substance" was extensively carried on at Constantinople during the middle ages. Combs, caskets, horns, boxes, etc., of carved ivory and bone, often set in precious stones, of the old Roman and Anglo-Saxon periods are frequently found in tombs.

An Eskimo Legend.

Among the Eskimos, the angakos or sorcerer who would visit Sedna, the goddess who lives underground or in the depths of the ocean, presiding over one of the countries to which souls go after death, must first pass the arsissut—the dwellings of the happy dead—and then cross an abyss in which a wheel as slippery as ice is constantly turning round. Arriving at the house of Sedna, he finds it guarded by terrible animals, sometimes described as seals, and sometimes as dogs, and when within the house passage he has to cross an abyss by means of a bridge as narrow as a knife edge.

Keeping Up Appearances.

The tall man in the suit of faded black went into the first class restaurant and seated himself at a table in a far corner. Lingering there a minute or two, he rose stiffly and went to the cashier's desk. "If a gentleman can't be waited on promptly in this place," he said, with a frown, "there are plenty of other places." Then he strolled leisurely out, picking his teeth, and presently wended his way unobtrusively to the five cent lunch counter around the corner.—Chicago Tribune.

THE GRAND PROMOTER

Stranger Looking For Wealth Gives the Major a Surprise.

VICTIM WAS WILLING ENOUGH.

But as His Capital Consisted of Just 25 Cents He Was Not the Kind of a Man the Promoter Cared to Do Business With.

[Copyright, 1907, by E. C. Parcells.]

The grand promoter had just reached his office and thrown up the solitary window to let the spring sunshine and the songs of robins and bluebirds float into the room at so much a float when the door, which he had carelessly left unlocked, opened to admit a man who was a stranger to him. The man had a smile on his face, and that proved that he wasn't a creditor. His attitude was not at all aggressive, and that showed he was not a bill collector. His look was not interrogative, and therefore he was not going to inquire for the corn doctor or dentist upstairs.

The grand promoter was puzzled, and he held his breath while the caller looked around and made ready to ask:

"Excuse me, but is this the office of Major Crofoot?"

"It is."

"Major Crofoot, the grand promoter?"

"The same."

"The Major Crofoot who has made a hundred different men rich by letting them in on the ground floor of his enterprises?"

"I am the man. What can I do for you today?"

"Look here, major," continued the caller as he helped himself to a seat on one of the broken backed chairs, "I've got a little money to invest, and I was advised to come to you. I was told that you could double and quadruple it for me in six months."

Breathed With Difficulty.

The major breathed with difficulty. He had counted up his cash capital that morning and had found it amounted to but 27 cents. His shoes needed repairing, his clothes needed cleaning and the landlord would be after him for the rent that week. Here was a fly that had walked into his net, and he looked like an easy fly to work. It was fifteen seconds before he could reply:

"You have come to the right place, sir, and you could not have arrived at a more opportune moment. I have organized and am just incorporating the greatest, grandest enterprise of the forty that I have had to do with in the last five years. I can make a rich man of you in a year."

"By crickey, but you are the feller I'm looking for!" exclaimed the other. "My name's White—Jim White. I've saved a little money, and I want to get rich. I'm no hog, but I want a span of horses, a diamond pin and enough to buy three tons of coal at once. Go ahead and tell me what you've got. I've got the rhino right here in my pocket to hand over."

"My dear sir," purred the major as his smile took on the look of a bunch of ripe yellow bananas, "my latest and greatest and grandest enterprise is 'The Great American Hole In the Ground.' The capital is $5,000,000, but we have only to pay in $1,000 for advertising purposes. The shares are nonassessable and will be sold for whatever we can get. Everything that comes in over the first thousand is so much velvet. I am the president of the corporation, and I want a secretary. His duties will consist in helping me open the mail and taking out and counting the money sent in by suckers."

"Then it's a snide thing?" queried Mr. White.

"Not at all, sir. On the contrary, it's a perfectly legitimate enterprise. I can take up a daily paper and show you thirty advertisements of the same thing. The only difference is that while they advertise their schemes as copper and silver mines, we are honest enough to advertise ours as a hole in the ground. It's just as honest as the railroad deals taking place every day. Our only care must be to make the hole in the ground big enough to hold all the money sent in by the suckers."

"But who will bite at a hole in the ground?"

The Major's Scheme.

"Tens of thousands of people, most of whom wouldn't buy a thirty dollar cow for $20 if offered by one of their neighbors. They've got money to burn, and they had as soon burn it in a hole in the ground as anywhere else. I advertise it simply as a hole. The public imagination puts gold, silver, copper, oil, diamonds, rubies or what not into the hole and invests. I start out by offering $1 shares for 5 cents. Then they jump to 10—20—20—40, and so on up. Just before each jump the suckers tumble over each other to get in at the old price."

"But you've got to come to an end somewhere," said Mr. White.

"Of course. After we have jumped the shares to 75 and the suckers are beginning to inquire about dividends we bank the last of their cash and start out to buy yachts and manor houses. The hole in the ground is left for them to go out west and look at. If some one has stolen the hole and carried it off, we are not to be held responsible. Eminently safe and dead easy. The suckers never make any trouble. If they do, we bribe a lawyer to scare them off on the grounds that they were trying to swindle us. Didn't you read in the papers in March about the railroad king that mortgaged a railroad line not yet surveyed to buy the stock of a running road and water it one-half? Our dodge is more honest than that."

"By thunder, but a feller once sold me a gold brick, and now I'd like to get even with some one else!" exclaimed Mr. White as he rose up and walked around.

"Then here's your opportunity. Nothing like it under the sun. The Great American Hole In the Ground will do the business.

"Where is the hole?"

"We don't say."

"What is in the hole?

"We don't say."

"How deep is the hole?

"We don't say."

"How wide is it?"

"We don't say."

All Kinds of Wealth.

"We simply stick to the Great American Hole In the Ground, and the dear public does the rest. Five days after we begin advertising it will take a carpetbag to hold our money letters. In ten days we will need a barrel. In a month the letters will be brought from the postoffice by a moving van. Not a word from the postal authorities against the scheme. Not a philanthropist anywhere looking out for the suckers. Ministers, widows, schoolteachers, orphans, pensioners and blind men all looking for that hole in the ground, and 100 per cent profits. Do you see?"

"Gaul durn me if I don't!" replied Mr. White.

"Willing to go in with me?"

"Ten times over. How much do I get out of it?"

"A salary of $25,000 a year to start with. If you are active and prompt about opening the letters and taking out the suckers' money, you shall have a raise within three months. All we want to start with is the $1,000 for advertising. And"—

"And here is this much toward it."

And Mr. White went down into his pocket and fished up a quarter of a dollar and held it out on his palm. It was there a full minute before the major asked:

"What for?"

"So much toward the thousand. I'll be on hand Monday morning to begin opening the suckers' letters."

The grand promoter had talked a lung out, and the other lung wanted a holiday. Therefore he couldn't talk. He simply sighed, took Mr. White by the shoulders and turned him around and pushed him out, and then, locking the door, he sat down with such a general weakness stealing over him that he hadn't ambition enough to jab at a cockroach with a stub pen.

Awful Shock.

Harker's wife was out of town on a visit. When Harker opened his mail the other morning he found a neat little check and the following note:

"Dear John—Inclosed you will find $2.99. Please credit same to my 'conscience fund.' After long hours of deliberation I have reached the conclusion that I paid too much for my spring hat. Lovingly, Julia."

Then Harker fainted.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Wild Scramble.

"How many courses do they have?" whispered the city man who was about to take his first meal in the country boarding house.

"Only one," replied the old boarder, "and we call that the 'race course.'"

"Race course? That's a queer name."

"Not at all. You have to race or you don't get anything at all."—Houston Post.

Up to Date.

Father—Willie, your conduct of late has been most reprehensible. I cannot imagine where you learn such behavior.

Willie—Am I to understand, sir, that you entirely discredit the theory of heredity?—Woman's Home Companion.

Not For Him.

"Mean thing!" exclaimed Mrs. Newlywed. "It's just brutal of you to call it this stuff.' You said you'd be glad if I baked my own bread"—

"Yes, dear," replied the great brute, "but I didn't say I wanted you to bake mine."—Philadelphia Press.

The man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

The Spirit Of Socialism.

By Congressman BOURKE COCKRAN of New York.

THE same problem is presenting itself for solution in Europe as in America.

It is the question which has been developed under what I may call Christian civilization. IT IS THE PARAMOUNT ISSUE. You may call it socialism if you please. It is how to distribute in proper proportions the result of labor and the employment of capital. In other words, can Christian civilization CONTROL ITS OWN SUCCESS? In America we call it the trust question.

In France, at the present moment, it manifests itself as the right of government employees to combine, and we see a socialistic premier fighting the extension to government servants of the doctrines he has always preached. In England the problem is rather simpler, as the English have always managed to keep their government practically free from COMMERCIAL INFLUENCES, but there, too, we have an independent labor party, led by Mr. Keir Hardie, which is frankly socialistic.

The situation in England reminds me very much of the Populist situation in America a few years ago. Many people thought that the Populists would never exert any influence east of the Mississippi, but they were mistaken. I should not be surprised to see the labor or socialistic element capture the Liberal party in England. In this event there will probably be a REALIGNMENT of political parties and the discovery of new leaders.

I do not think there is any great increase in the strength of the AVOWED socialistic party in Europe. The serious matter is that more is being done to promote socialism BY THOSE WHO DENOUNCE SOCIALISM than by all the avowed Socialists.

A spirit of socialism is fostered by the indiscriminate cry for the regulation of corporations. I believe that the state has the right to regulate, if necessary, the corporations which control public utilities, and on this ground Roosevelt's rate bill is perfectly sound in principle, but to extend this doctrine TO ALL CORPORATIONS INDISCRIMINATELY is not only unwise, but dangerous.

Another very serious question in America at the present time is the loss of public confidence in the JUDICIARY. Look at the Perkins case. Was there ever such a travesty of justice? Instead of being tried on the facts of the case he was invited to write a letter setting forth HIS view of the facts, and then by a majority of one a decision is rendered that the facts submitted do not disclose any criminal intent.

SUCH DECISIONS HAVE CAUSED THE PUBLIC TO LOSE CONFIDENCE IN THE JUDICIARY, AND IT IS VITALLY NECESSARY THAT PUBLIC CONFIDENCE IN THE INTEGRITY OF THE BENCH SHOULD BE RESTORED.

Nonpartisanship In Judges.

By DAVID J. BREWER, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

THERE is undoubtedly a belief on the part of some that a long tenure in judicial office is against the true theory of popular government, and there is in consequence a clamor that the judicial term of office shall be reduced TO A BRIEF PERIOD. I once had occasion as circuit judge to decide a matter involving the prohibition laws of Kansas and decided it against the convictions of the radical advocates of prohibition, whereupon the leaders met in convention and passed a resolution demanding that federal judges should be appointed or elected FOR ONLY ONE YEAR. The judges of the federal courts as well as of the courts of two or three states are appointed for life, which intensifies the clamor against them.

Yet the very persons who have this feeling in respect to judicial decisions would shrink from carrying it to its LOGICAL RESULT. They would at first distrust and soon despise a judge whose decisions were always in favor of one set of men or one party. A man may be never so strong a partisan, and yet he not unnaturally begins to lose confidence in the integrity of a judge who is deciding all cases IN FAVOR OF HIS PARTY. There is a conviction which cannot be put one side that partisanship on the part of a judge is a grievous wrong.

FOR INSTANCE, NOTHING HAS HAPPENED TO SHAKE THE CONFIDENCE OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES SO MUCH AS THE FACT THAT ON THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION THE JUDGES DIVIDED ACCORDING TO POLITICS.

Medical Expert Evidence Is Not Highly Regarded.

By Dr. CLARK BELL, President of the Medico-Legal Society of New York City.

THE reason medical expert evidence is generally regarded as a matter of dollars and cents is because the expert represents the side that employs him almost as much as the counsel does. This is the fault of the PRESENT SYSTEM and is not the fault of the medical expert. It can only be remedied by legislation. The Maine bill is the best and most feasible plan of meeting the present situation. The bill originated through the efforts of L. A. Emery, chief justice of the supreme court of Maine.

Take, for example, the Thaw case. Suppose that this bill now proposed had been adopted by the legislature of the state of New York and a motion had been made in the supreme court for the appointment of three or five eminent alienists to HEAR AND DETERMINE THE QUESTION AT ISSUE in that case. Suppose further that two leading experts of the defense, Dr. Charles P. Wagner and Dr. Britton D. Evans, had been appointed by the court, with Dr. Austin Flint and Dr. Mabon. The conditions would have been wholly changed. There would not have been the slightest occasion for the PARTISANSHIP that was exhibited at that trial.

THE BILL PROVIDES THAT THE EXPERTS THUS SELECTED SHALL BE PAID BY THE STATE, AND THE AMOUNT OF THEIR COMPENSATION IS TO BE FIXED BY THE JUDGE WHO TRIES THE CASE.

WHO KILLED TRUMAN ROOT.

Strong Drink Shall Be Bitter to Them That Drink It. Isaiah 24:9.

The following sermon was preached Sunday evening last in the M. E. church by the pastor, Rev. J. B. Workman, and is published at the request of many who were present on that occasion :

I have chosen the theme which I have announced not with any view to rendering a sensational discourse, neither with a view to making any criticism of our honorable Court, which, after a patient hearing of all the evidence that could be had in the case, decided that John Brown was the slayer of Truman Root, but I have chosen this theme because I believe that at this time there is an opportunity to impress upon the minds and consciences of the people the stubborn, potent and irresistible fact that at the root of this whole matter there lies reeking in crime and lust and blood that wily, subtle, serpentine foe of the home, the state and the church, the licensed beverage liquor traffic. A few years ago when Bishop Fowler presided over the session of our annual conference, in addressing a class of young ministers who were about to be admitted to membership in the conference, after advising them along various lines, he said: "Young men, whenever possible attend court, watch the trained and skillful lawyer as he presents his argument to the jury and to the court and go to your pulpits and thus preach Christ to the unsaved, and besides," he said, "it is a good place to study humanity with reference to the dark side of human life with which we so often have to deal." With this thought in view I have spent considerable time in the court room during the past week, and I think not without some profit for this expenditure of time. I followed the case that is suggested by the theme of this discourse through all of its harrowing, repulsive and revolting details, and while some thoughtless ones laughed and chuckled over some of the vile and shameful details of the testimony that were revealed in the unfolding of the case, my heart was sick and my soul was filled with wonder at the depth of human depravity until, with the Psalmist, I was led to exclaim: "What is man that thou art mindful of him and the son of man that thou visitest him?" When I had considered I determined again to fight with all the energy of my soul that demon that sinks men and women—made in the likeness and image of God in their first estate—to a level lower than that of the brute creation. The demon that sent Truman Root unprepared into the presence of the Judge Eternal; that sent John Brown to the penitentiary of Maryland for a long term of eight years, and, worse still, that brands him with the mark of Cain all the days of his life. The demon that uncovered the shame of that shameless woman in whose vile resort this sickening and revolting crime was committed. And as I listened to the State's inquiry: "Who killed Truman Root?" and heard the testimony of the witnesses both for the prosecution and the defense, I could read between the lines all through the evidence, in letters glowing with the red blood af the victim of this tragedy: "It was strong drink that killed Truman Root." How forcibly did this assertion of the inspired Prophet Isaiah come down through the ages to me: "Strong drink shall be bitter to them that drink it." Then I listened again and I heard from the witness stand what purported to be the repetition of John Brown's own words when first informed of the awfulness of the finding of the coroner's inquest; and what were these words? "WHISKEY HAS DONE IT FOR ME!" Then as I listened to the argument of our State's Attorney, whose experience for years has made him familiar with the most productive cause of crime and he fearlessly declared that at the foundation of the whole crime was strong drink. Then when the counsel for the defense, whose practice of law for almost fifty years has given him every opportunity to look into the cause of crime, spoke in behalf of the accused, he, too, indicated that the seat of the whole trouble was in the evil of strong drink; and when the Court, consisting of Chief Judge Boyd and Associate Judge Henderson, men skilled in law and evidence, came to render their decision and to pronounce sentence upon John Brown for the crime of manslaughter, they said that "this is another of those crimes traceable to the immoderate use of alchoholic beverages, but when a man willingly takes into his stomach that which will drive out his brains that man must bear the consequences, and therefore we sentence John Brown to a term of eight years in the Maryland Penitentiary." Verily the prophet spoke advisedly when he said, "Strong drink shall be bitter to them that drink it."

The object of this discourse is not presumed to in any way effect Truman Root, nor with any view of making any reflection unduly on his memory, he has gone beyond the reach of help; neither is it my purpose to add to the bitterness of the life of John Brown, nor with any hope of saving him; for if the lesson he has already had does not work a reformation in his life no word which I could say would be of any avail; but I speak tonight with a two-fold purpose in view which I shall make no effort to conceal and for which I make no apology whatever. 1st. That I may call back to sobriety (and I mean by that to total abstinence) and virtue any in the congregation who may be playing with the deadly monster, strong drink. 2nd. That I may, with God's help, have some part in arousing public sentiment that has for, alas too long, been dormant with reference to this evil that has grown up and has so strongly entrenched itself in this and other parts of this county, so that evils directly traceable to this cause are too often regarded as a matter of course, or condoned and excused by an over indulgent populace. Truly has it been said :

"Sin is a monster of such hideous mein,
That to be hated needs only to be seen;
But seen too oft we become familiar with it's face;
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

Is it not a fact that is patent to every casual observer that all over this county there are to be found young men and older men—yea even boys, and I blush to say it, and women—who do not hesitate to press to their lips the fatal glass that has charged to its account more assaults, more thefts, more incests, more fratricides, more homicides than all other sources of evil combined; and, furthermore, this accursed demon, it has been already proven, is chargeable with being the direct cause of more ignorance, more idiocy, more imbeciility, more lunacy, more poverty, more disease, more, indeed, of everything that is devilish and degrading than is every other source of evil which is known to man.

Young men, young women, tonight could I get you to see as it seems to me every thoughtful person should see the poisonous serpent that lurks in every glass of liquor you would, I am persuaded, dash forever from your hand the glass containing that which the wise and inspired prophet refers to when he says: "Strong drink shall be bitter to them that drink it."

This accursed business sometimes, all unwittingly, points to its own shame. Recently over an advertisement carried by one of the saloon keepers of this town was the caption: "Murder, Murder," and whether this was ominous or not I am not prepared to say, but the facts are, as many of you know, that that den of iniquity has been closed under the sheriff's hammer. And when a few days since I saw in the show window of another saloon of this town, whose glaring and brazen impudence and presence on the most prominent business street of the county seat of this county is an insult to decency, I say when I saw there, coiled in that window, and surrounded by a lavish display of the infernal liquid that is dispensed from within that place, three poisonous, deadly rattlesnakes, it was to me as though I stood in the presence of the lofty minded prophet who is the author of my text, and heard him say: "The way is so plain the wayfaring men though fools need not err therein." Or, I could close my eyes and in my imagination I could see the wise man Solomon stand before that window and in all solemnity point to that living and real illustration of the results of liquor and say as he said of it almost three thousand years ago: "At the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." I am certain that this, too, was an ominous sign—betokening that poison, and hate, and venom awaited every partaker of the distilled damnation from within.

Had John Brown and Truman Root learned long ago the lesson that I labor tonight to impress upon you, the wife of Truman Root need not to have been a widow, his children need not to be fatherless with the heritage handed down to them and shadowing their lives that their father had died in such shameful surroundings. Had they learned as you may this lesson John Brown instead of being a convict and languishing tonight in a convict's cell, might have been at his own fireside to cheer the heart of her whom he vowed at the matrimonial altar he would protect and defend as long as they both should live. But alas! alas! they learned not this lesson and consequently marriage vows have been broken, wives have been widowed and worse than widowed, children have been disgraced and rendered fatherless, and an overindulgent community has been shocked, and shamed, and outraged. Garrett county has had one more dark crime added to the already too long list of criminal acts traceable to its foolish custom of authorizing the sale of alcoholic beverages.

I return now, in closing, to the question that has been the all-absorbing question during these recent days: "Who killed Truman Root?" The finding of the court of inquiry was that John Brown, a neighbor of Truman Root, a man who came with him to this section of the country, and who through all these years had been his friend, a man who had entertained Root at his own table only a few days prior to this tragedy, and who on the very afternoon of the murder was his friendly companion, a man for whom he had gone at this very time on an errand. The Court decided that John Brown took the life of Truman Root.

Technically speaking and in the sight of the law I doubt not that this is true. But how unnatural; I say how unnatural that John Brown, his neighbor and friend, his boon companion, if you please, should take his life.

I have already said that the witnesses indicated that liquor was the cause, that lawyers both for the prosecution and defense, that the Court, too, declared that this crime had its inception in strong drink, and the accused himself, we are told, said "whiskey has done it for me." It was not the John Brown who was a kind and obliging neighbor; it was not the John Brown who was a gentle husband, but the John Brown whom liquor had demonized and brutalized that struck, we are told, the fatal blow that took the life of Truman Root, thus widowing his wife and depriving his family of him whom nature has decreed should be their defender and support, that ruined the home of John Brown and made his gentle wife's condition a thousand fold worse than that of a widow, that consigned John Brown to the Marvland penitentiary for eight years and branded him as a murderer. It was liquor that demoralized the brain, that controlled the hand that dealt the blow that snapped out the life of Truman Root.

Who placed that liquor within the reach of John Brown? By his own testimony one George R. Long declared that he had sold to these men the liquor consumed and that he became a consuming fire on that occasiou. Should I say to him: Sir, your act in selling that liquor resulted in the death of Truman Root, what would be his response. He would point to his license duly signed by the authorities of the commonwealth and this government and say, "I only did that which these men in their official capacity have authorized me to do."

I ask again: "Who killed Truman Root."

I turn to these officials with a look of accusation, but they quickly turn to the acts of the legislature of the state of Maryland and say that the legislature of the state directed us to sign the license of that man when he had met with certain requirements and our hands are free of the blood of any.

I turn now to the men who enacted this legislation and say, you are charged here indirectly with the murder of this man, for your act made possible this crime; but they say it was not us, we were the servants of the people, and as representatives of certain party politicians and principles simply carried out the wish of the people, therefore we plead not guilty; we were but the voice of the people.

Ah! hear me tonight, my brother, my fellow-citizen; you who possess the right of suffrage. When the final inquiry is made and when the court of last resort shall have been reached and when he who is the Allwise Judge of all men shall ask, "Who killed Truman Root?" if you, if we, have failed to use our voice and vote to protest against that which makes possible and that which even breeds and encourages such crimes, I say, can we stand in His presence and say I am innocent of the blood of any.

Within the past year a few hundred people lost their lives in this country by earthquake, and what consternation among our whole people! But during that same year the liquor traffic slew one hundred thousand people; but, alas, how little has been said about it. Men have died on the rail almost at our very doors, others have been injured and have become a county charge as a result of this evil, and yet, I ask, what is being done? Who is lifting a hand to prevent this foul curse that every day is tightening its grip on this community in which we live and that every day threatens to come into your home and mine and drag down our sons and daughters and murder them or send them out as murderers, thus bringing shame and reproach on the name they have borne?

May common sense and decency and the spirit of God Almighty so arouse this community that in our indignation and in God's name we may rise up and smite this bloody-handed business until it shall be found no more among us, is my prayer.

Indigestion

Stomach trouble is but a symptom of, and not in itself a true disease. We think of Dyspepsia, Heartburn, and Indigestion as real diseases, yet they are symptoms only of a certain specific Nerve sickness—nothing else.

It was this fact that first correctly led Dr. Shoop in the creation of that now very popular Stomach Remedy—Dr. Shoop's Restorative. Going direct to the stomach nerves, alone brought that success and favor to Dr. Shoop and his Restorative. Without that original and highly vital principle, no such lasting accomplishments were ever to be had.

For stomach distress, bloating, billousness, bad breath and sallow complexion, try Dr. Shoop's Restorative—Tablets or Liquid—and see for yourself what it can and will do. We sell and cheerfully recommend

Corporations and Our Multi-Millionaires.

By HENRY CLEWS, Wealthy New York Banker.

IT is gratifying to observe that our people have always taken time to consider the problems of the times BEFORE ACTING. An interesting and important question today is whether great individual and corporate wealth is a menace. Economists have always disagreed over the DEFINITION of wealth. For us it will be enough to consider wealth as all our worldly possessions. It has always been the tendency of man to aspire to wealth and higher conditions. This is the MAINSPRING OF HUMAN PROGRESS.

In our own country the result of the aspirations of men for wealth and higher conditions has been the most marvelous growth recorded by history. Americans DO NOT HOARD THEIR WEALTH. They employ it in buying luxuries and in developing the resources of the country.

We can refute much that has been said against our men of wealth. The usefulness of these men has NEVER been appreciated. Shall we ever forget what Americans of wealth—John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, John Hancock, James Madison, Robert Morris, George Washington, all capitalists—did in colonial times? At the time of the civil war, when the government was in financial distress, the WEALTHY MEN came to the rescue. We all know how Senator Leland Stanford bestowed his wealth in founding a California university and that John D. Rockefeller's money built the Chicago university. I might mention cases without number of where the seeds of education have been sown broadcast from Maine to Texas by the rich. Brightest among the galaxy of philanthropists shines the name of Andrew Carnegie.

A great amount of wealth IN THE HANDS OF ONE MAN enables him to direct it in philanthropy and business in a way that will cause it to be of the greatest value in advancing the welfare of the country. The cry of "tainted money" very often causes the spirit of the donor to be UNDERRATED.

While we now have billionaires, THE POOR ARE GROWING RICHER and the list of taxpayers longer. There need be no fear for the institutions of our country by the wealth of individuals. Great capitalists are usually self made, and they are usually men of GREAT CHARACTER as well as of great ability. Their wealth may be abused in the hands of heirs. Laws could be passed to prevent such abuse.

Corporate bodies are often managed by irresponsible directors in a manner that makes its wealth A MENACE. It is here that the law has stepped in, and no doubt the enforcement of the laws will eliminate the dangers.

THE REMEDY FOR CORPORATION WRONGDOING IS FOUND IN PUBLICITY. THE LEGISLATURE SHOULD PASS LAWS COMPELLING ALL CORPORATIONS TO MAKE SEMIANNUAL ACCOUNTINGS.

The Genius of the Dramatist.

By JAMES BRYCE, British Ambassador to the United States.

I THINK of the vast sums poured out for the support of the theater! Think of the audience which waits upon the playwright today! NEVER IN THE WORLD'S HISTORY was there anything like it, never. Would it not have been expected that the opportunity for a dramatist would produce one of the first magnitude? It has failed to do so. I am not competent to discuss the modern play. It is TOO VARIED, too complex a theme. But I cannot refrain from feeling that one of the greatest opportunities offered the dramatist in the history of the modern world is going unavailed of.

I should hardly agree that the dramatist's art is one in which GENIUS is rarely exhibited. It is true that there are a few names which stand so very high in dramatic glory that they put all other claimants to greatness out of countenance. But, aside from the Greeks and Shakespeare, there have been in all lands and ages dramatists the like of whose genius, exhibited in any art, WOULD ENTITLE THEM TO IMMORTALITY. We may claim this for several, certainly, of our English playwriters of earlier days. The Germans have had their great dramatists in the past, and I have warm admiration for Hauptmann and Sudermann today. But today has not given another Goethe or Schiller.

THE FRENCH WOULD INSIST THAT RACINE, CORNEILLE AND MOLIERE ARE AMONG THE WORLD'S GREATEST MEN, AND THEY WOULD BE RIGHT.

The Encroachments of Executive Authority.

By United States Senator JOSEPH B. FORAKER of Ohio.

I BELIEVE in our dual system of government, one state and the other national; one to deal with local affairs, the other with those that are NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL. I believe that as the business of the government and the duties of the government multiply it will become more and more strikingly manifest that our fathers were wise in providing such a system and that, instead of talking about the obliterations of state lines, we should now more than ever be careful to preserve to the states THEIR PROPER RIGHTS AND FUNCTIONS, just as we have always been zealous to protect the federal government in the exercise of all the powers delegated to it, either expressly or by implication.

I believe also that our fathers were wise when they created three departments of government AND MADE THEM SEPARATE independent and CO-ORDINATE and that the rights of each should be jealously protected against infringement by either of the others.

CONTRACTS LET FOR THREE COUNTY BRIDGES

Commissioners Awarded Two to York Bridge Co., and One to Penn Bridge Co.

$539 IS THE PRICE PAID FOR EACH

To Be Located Near Friendsville, Jennings and Dobbin and All of Them To Be Completed by Fall—Bids Were Submitted by Four Companies.

The County Commissioners were in session Tuesday and awarded the contracts for building three bridges, one near Dobbin, another at Jennings, and the third near Friendsville. The York Bridge Co., of York, Pa.. will build two of them, the one at Dobbin and the other at Jennings; while the Penn Bridge Co., of Beavers Falls, Pa., will build the third at Friendsville. The price for each is $539.00. All of the bridges are to be complete by the last part of September. The other companies that submitted bids were the Micalvaine Bridge Co., Chambersburg, Pa., and the Nelson Bridge Co., of the same place.

The bids of Penn Bridge Company and of the York Bridge Company were exactly the same, each being $539 for each of the three bridges. The County Commissioners awarded a contract for one to each one of them and decided by lot as to which of the two companies should have the third. The lots favored the York Bridge Company, with the result that it is to erect two of three.

Bids also were opened for the stone and concrete work at each of the structures. Two bids were submitted. The one of Mr. Z. C. Gibson, of Loch Lynn Heights, was the lower for the stone work at Friendsville and Jennings, while Mr. J. W. Cogley, of Oakland, submitted the lower bids for the concrete work at the Dobbin bridge.

Senator Brown appeared before the County Commissioners, asking that they issue $10,000 of the Court House bonds in the denomination of $100.00 each. The Commissioners stated that they would be unable now to change the denominations of the bonds, it now being too late; but they added that had anyone appeared before them sooner, before the bonds were ordered to be printed, they may have elected to issue the bonds in the lower denomination; now, however, it was too late to make a change.

Street Cars in Grafton.

On Monday the first work for the laying of an electric street car track in Grafton was begun. It is expected that cars will be running by the last part of September.

GAS PLANT EXPLODED.

Deer Park Hotel Deprived of Lights for a Short Time Saturday.

The acetylene gas plant at the Deer Park Hotel blew up Saturday evening. Besides blowing down the building in which the plant was located and damaging slightly the electric light plant which was near by, there was no other damage done by the explosion. Within twenty-four hours after the accident occurred Manager Burwell had the plant again in operation. The cause of the explosion is unknown, other than that it is supposed that gas escaped, filling the small building in which the plant was located, and this in turn becoming ignited, causing an explosion which was heard as far as the hotel. The gas plant is located south of the railroad, near the electric light plant.

Two Cent Fare to be General.

It is reported from Chicago that passenger rates on all railroads of the United States will be reduced to two cents a mile. The lowering of the price and complete abolition of the old three-cent rates will begin on July 1.

This was the decision reached in Chicago Friday after a long and heated discussion by the leading railroad presidents of all the Western and transcontinental roads. It was not a formal agreement, but it is equally binding, for two large roads doing a trans-continental business are said to have served an ultimatum to others that they would put the rate into effect immediately.

Following the meeting, officials of several of the roads admitted that they had been forced to bow to public opinion and anti-railroad legislation. They said that no further fight would be made on the two-cent laws already passed, and that the roads would accept the inevitable.

Among those who are said to have attended the secret meeting were President B. L. Winchell of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, and President A. J. Earling of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul. Neither would discuss the report.

Reception Tendered Mrs. H. Bowman

The many friends and relatives of Mrs. Hannah Bowman, relict of H. A. Bowman, deceased, met at her home in the Park Tuesday evening, and tendered her a reception, that day being the eighty-seventh anniversary of her birth. During the evening, refreshments, consisting of ice cream, cake, coffee, and chocolate, were served to the guests. The evening was most pleasantly spent, the hour being enlivened by reminiscenses of the last half century. Among those present were: Rev. E. J. Westfall and wife, Mr. J. A. Hayden and wife, Mr. Garrett Moon, Mrs. Spitzer, Mrs. Murphy, Mrs. Sperry, Mr. P. T. Garthright, Misses Murphy, and other relatives.

HIGH OFFICIALS WERE IN SESSION

The Heads of the Several Departmen's of the B. & O. Met at Deer Park.

IMPORTANT QUESTIONS DISCUSSED

The Session Lasted Two Days and was Under the Supervision of General Manager Fitzgerald, Who Led the Discussion Along Highly Practical Lines.

The Deer Park Hotel was a veritable bee hive Saturday and Sunday, when the heads of the various departments of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad met there to discuss the best methods to improve the service of the road. Among the many subjects given attention were those dealing with the efficiency and improvement of car service to get best results in loading, unloading and quick movement and minimizing per diem charges, best method of handling material and supplies on various divisions and maintaining smallest amount of stock on hand without danger of shortage and maintenance of track in first class condition, free from extraordinary expenditure. The meeting was under Mr. Thomas Fitzgerald, general manager. At the same time was celebrated the opening of the Deer Park hotel.

Fully 200 officers from Baltimore, Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Chicago, and, in fact, points all over the system, assembled in the ballroom as a happy family of intelligent and experienced railroad men, working faithfully for the railroad company and themselves.

Had it been possible for President Murray to be present it would have pleased him to look into the face of these loyal Baltimore and Ohio men and feel that the operating department staff had been wisely selected. General Manager Fitzgerald called the meeting to order and presided. He is a firm believer that much good is accomplished by an exchange of ideas and opinions in this way. Sitting with him at the presiding table were L. G. Haas, assistant general manager; George H. Campbell, vice president of the Staten Island Rapid Transit Railway, New York, and W. H. Brimson, general superintendent of the Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern railroad, Cincinnati. J. R. Kearney, superintendent of car service, opened the discussion of car service, touching on per diem and reclaims, interchange of cars with connections and the most effective rules to get best results.

"Although the car service can be improved, we feel that we are pushing right ahead," said Mr. Fitzgerald. "Let us have the right kind of co-operation. Co-operation does not mean mutual admiration. It is prompt service, that is only given by energetic action, with good business methods."

"We know our general here," said Mr. Campbell, speaking of Mr. Fitzgerald. "He is all energy and force, and sets a shining example to us all. He goes day and night wherever the business require it. We should be plain and outspoken with those with whom we come in contact, but at the same time retain our friendly relations. Then I believe the average miles per car per day will be increased to 50."

Assisstant General Manager Haas said:

The average mile per car per day is the most important factor and direct measure of what we get out of our cars. I think we can estimate that a car moves 10 miles an hour and in view of the fact that cars are making a little over 30 miles a day, that is equal to about three hours moving and 21 idle each day. The obvious thing to do is reduce the time a car is standing still, and by concentrating our efforts in that line, results will be accomplished. We have heard a great deal about increas-increasing speed of cars on line. Of course, this is important, but a very small factor when compared with the time a car is standing still."

A committee was appointed to look into the question of quickest handling of system and foreign cars, and report to General Manager Fitzgerald. E. H. Bankard, purchasing agent, and D. A. Williams, general storekeeper, talked on railroad material and supplies, distribution and best method of handling requisitions.

J. B. Dickson, chief engineer of maintenance of way, spoke on track conditions, which he reported very good, though high water had damaged the roadbed considerably and thus increased expenses. E. Stimson, engineer of maintenance of way, Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern, spoke along similar lines.

Richard L. Enman, private secretary to General Manager Fitzgerald, made a stenographic report of the proceedings. Mr. George L. Potter, third vice president, could not be present, but was represented by J. W. Coon, his chief clerk. F. W. Busse, chief clerk, represented J. E. Muhlfele, general superintendent of motive power. E. V Baugh, superintendent of dining cars, was present in the interest of his department.

The officials were quartered at the Deer Park Hotel and well taken care of by W. E. Burwell, manager. Circuit Chief Adams, with a corps of operators, promptly handled the large volume of telegraph business that originated during the day.

Among the ladies here were Mrs. J.E. Greiner, the Misses Greiner, Mrs. J. W. Coon, Mrs. C. W. Galloway, Miss Galloway and Mrs. D. A. Williams.

Father Stanton to Cruise.

Father Thomas J. Stanton, pastor of St. Joseph's Catholic Church, Baltimore, was in Oakland Monday. The daily press recently has been reporting that he was broken down in health. This however, he denies; while he has been sick, yet he is much better than he was and is gradually improving. About July 1st Rev. Stanton will sail from New York on the White Star Line for an extended tour of Europe. He will cruise along the western coast of Africa, and later will tour through Spain, England and Switzerland. He feels that after he has taken this trip that he will be greatly improved in health. Rev. Stanton is a son of the late Mr. Lawrence Stanton, of Oakland, and is also a brother of Mr. Jerry Stanton, of Oakland. At one time he was pastor of the church at Lonaconing.

Children's Day at Swanton.

The children's day service at the M. E. Church on Sunday night, was a grand success. The church was nicely decorated and the program was well rendered and was attentively listened to by one of the largest congregations that has ever assembled in Swanton. The music, both vocal and instrumental, was good, the recitations were excellent, and the entire service was very interesting and reflects credit upon those who had it in charge as well as upon each one who took part in the service. It was one of the most successful children's day exercises ever conducted in Swanton. * *

Team Struck at Deer Park.

Mr. Oscar Friend was driving a team across the railroad track at Deer Park Tuesday evening when a locomotive approached unexpectedly. Mr. Friend was about half way across the track, when with great presence of mind he whirled the team about from in front of the train, with no other damage than that the jaw of the horse was injured, and that the tongue and coupling pole of the wagon were broken. The team belonged to Mr. John Spiker.

Picnic at Sugar Camp.

There will be a basket picnic near J. B. Lipscomb's Sugar Camp, back of Loch Lynn Heights, on Thursday, July 4th. It was at this same place that a picnic was given last year and at which so many had an excellent time. Everyone is invited to come and have a day's outing.

The Speakers on the Program have Met with Excellent Receptions—Is Growing in Interest as Days Go By—Attempt to Lengthen Out Season at Park.

The Kirk-Roads-Sweet-Levering aggregation is giving an excellent series of lectures at the Students Bible Conference which is being held this week at the Park under the supervision of Superintendent Davis. While the crowds are small yet the benefits of the lectures are great and far reaching. Those who have attended speak most highly of the excellency of the sessions and many have said that better speakers than those who have taken part in this conference will not be on the platform at the Park this summer.

The morning hours have been filled by Dr. Kirk, of Baltimore, and the afternoon sessions often by Dr. Sweet, the returned missionary from China. Dr. Roads has consented to come to Oakland, and next Sunday he will be present at the Methodist Church to take part in the meeting to be held there. Announcements of the hours are made in the church notices in this issue.

Hon. Joshua W. Levering, of Baltimore, ex-candidate upon the prohibition ticket for the presidency of the United States, and famous for his great coffee establishment, spoke upon missionary subjects Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. His lectures were exceedingly strong because they were so practicable and showed up directly just where the labors of the missionaries of the various churches in foreign fields bringing forth excellent fruit for Christianity.

One of these men will appear upon the platform each evening for the balance of this week and it is recognized everywhere that each of the speakers is without a peer in the line of thought which each follows.

Superintendent Davis today took the visiting lecturers upon a trip to the mountains, visiting the various places of interest near the Park.

One of the causes which have tended to reduce the number in attendance is that the convention is being held so early in the season. June, heretofore, at the Park has never had anything of this nature, the camp meeting always being the first attraction of the year. It is the intention of Superintendent Davis, however, to lengthen out the summer season at the Park, and it is hoped that by having something in June each year, that soon the second part of that month will be filled with as good things and as large audiences as are now the months of July and August.

The program for Sunday for the Bible Students Conference promises to be one of the best of the week, furnishing an excellent climax for the week's work. Besides the regular corps of lecturers, Dr. Cramblet will be present and add to the interest and to the benefits of the meetings.

CONTRACTS LET FOR THREE COUNTY BRIDGES

Commissioners Awarded Two to York Bridge Co., and One to Penn Bridge Co.

$539 IS THE PRICE PAID FOR EACH

To Be Located Near Friendsville, Jennings and Dobbin and All of Them To Be Completed by Fall—Bids Were Submitted by Four Companies.

The County Commissioners were in session Tuesday and awarded the contracts for building three bridges, one near Dobbin, another at Jennings, and the third near Friendsville. The York Bridge Co., of York, Pa.. will build two of them, the one at Dobbin and the other at Jennings; while the Penn Bridge Co., of Beavers Falls, Pa., will build the third at Friendsville. The price for each is $539.00. All of the bridges are to be complete by the last part of September. The other companies that submitted bids were the Micalvaine Bridge Co., Chambersburg, Pa., and the Nelson Bridge Co., of the same place.

The bids of Penn Bridge Company and of the York Bridge Company were exactly the same, each being $539 for each of the three bridges. The County Commissioners awarded a contract for one to each one of them and decided by lot as to which of the two companies should have the third. The lots favored the York Bridge Company, with the result that it is to erect two of three.

Bids also were opened for the stone and concrete work at each of the structures. Two bids were submitted. The one of Mr. Z. C. Gibson, of Loch Lynn Heights, was the lower for the stone work at Friendsville and Jennings, while Mr. J. W. Cogley, of Oakland, submitted the lower bids for the concrete work at the Dobbin bridge.

Senator Brown appeared before the County Commissioners, asking that they issue $10,000 of the Court House bonds in the denomination of $100.00 each. The Commissioners stated that they would be unable now to change the denominations of the bonds, it now being too late; but they added that had anyone appeared before them sooner, before the bonds were ordered to be printed, they may have elected to issue the bonds in the lower denomination; now, however, it was too late to make a change.

Street Cars in Grafton.

On Monday the first work for the laying of an electric street car track in Grafton was begun. It is expected that cars will be running by the last part of September.

GAS PLANT EXPLODED.

Deer Park Hotel Deprived of Lights for a Short Time Saturday.

The acetylene gas plant at the Deer Park Hotel blew up Saturday evening. Besides blowing down the building in which the plant was located and damaging slightly the electric light plant which was near by, there was no other damage done by the explosion. Within twenty-four hours after the accident occurred Manager Burwell had the plant again in operation. The cause of the explosion is unknown, other than that it is supposed that gas escaped, filling the small building in which the plant was located, and this in turn becoming ignited, causing an explosion which was heard as far as the hotel. The gas plant is located south of the railroad, near the electric light plant.

Two Cent Fare to be General.

It is reported from Chicago that passenger rates on all railroads of the United States will be reduced to two cents a mile. The lowering of the price and complete abolition of the old three-cent rates will begin on July 1.

This was the decision reached in Chicago Friday after a long and heated discussion by the leading railroad presidents of all the Western and transcontinental roads. It was not a formal agreement, but it is equally binding, for two large roads doing a trans-continental business are said to have served an ultimatum to others that they would put the rate into effect immediately.

Following the meeting, officials of several of the roads admitted that they had been forced to bow to public opinion and anti-railroad legislation. They said that no further fight would be made on the two-cent laws already passed, and that the roads would accept the inevitable.

Among those who are said to have attended the secret meeting were President B. L. Winchell of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, and President A. J. Earling of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul. Neither would discuss the report.

Reception Tendered Mrs. H. Bowman

The many friends and relatives of Mrs. Hannah Bowman, relict of H. A. Bowman, deceased, met at her home in the Park Tuesday evening, and tendered her a reception, that day being the eighty-seventh anniversary of her birth. During the evening, refreshments, consisting of ice cream, cake, coffee, and chocolate, were served to the guests. The evening was most pleasantly spent, the hour being enlivened by reminiscenses of the last half century. Among those present were: Rev. E. J. Westfall and wife, Mr. J. A. Hayden and wife, Mr. Garrett Moon, Mrs. Spitzer, Mrs. Murphy, Mrs. Sperry, Mr. P. T. Garthright, Misses Murphy, and other relatives.

HIGH OFFICIALS WERE IN SESSION

The Heads of the Several Departmen's of the B. & O. Met at Deer Park.

IMPORTANT QUESTIONS DISCUSSED

The Session Lasted Two Days and was Under the Supervision of General Manager Fitzgerald, Who Led the Discussion Along Highly Practical Lines.

The Deer Park Hotel was a veritable bee hive Saturday and Sunday, when the heads of the various departments of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad met there to discuss the best methods to improve the service of the road. Among the many subjects given attention were those dealing with the efficiency and improvement of car service to get best results in loading, unloading and quick movement and minimizing per diem charges, best method of handling material and supplies on various divisions and maintaining smallest amount of stock on hand without danger of shortage and maintenance of track in first class condition, free from extraordinary expenditure. The meeting was under Mr. Thomas Fitzgerald, general manager. At the same time was celebrated the opening of the Deer Park hotel.

Fully 200 officers from Baltimore, Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Chicago, and, in fact, points all over the system, assembled in the ballroom as a happy family of intelligent and experienced railroad men, working faithfully for the railroad company and themselves.

Had it been possible for President Murray to be present it would have pleased him to look into the face of these loyal Baltimore and Ohio men and feel that the operating department staff had been wisely selected. General Manager Fitzgerald called the meeting to order and presided. He is a firm believer that much good is accomplished by an exchange of ideas and opinions in this way. Sitting with him at the presiding table were L. G. Haas, assistant general manager; George H. Campbell, vice president of the Staten Island Rapid Transit Railway, New York, and W. H. Brimson, general superintendent of the Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern railroad, Cincinnati. J. R. Kearney, superintendent of car service, opened the discussion of car service, touching on per diem and reclaims, interchange of cars with connections and the most effective rules to get best results.

"Although the car service can be improved, we feel that we are pushing right ahead," said Mr. Fitzgerald. "Let us have the right kind of co-operation. Co-operation does not mean mutual admiration. It is prompt service, that is only given by energetic action, with good business methods."

"We know our general here," said Mr. Campbell, speaking of Mr. Fitzgerald. "He is all energy and force, and sets a shining example to us all. He goes day and night wherever the business require it. We should be plain and outspoken with those with whom we come in contact, but at the same time retain our friendly relations. Then I believe the average miles per car per day will be increased to 50."

Assisstant General Manager Haas said:

The average mile per car per day is the most important factor and direct measure of what we get out of our cars. I think we can estimate that a car moves 10 miles an hour and in view of the fact that cars are making a little over 30 miles a day, that is equal to about three hours moving and 21 idle each day. The obvious thing to do is reduce the time a car is standing still, and by concentrating our efforts in that line, results will be accomplished. We have heard a great deal about increasing speed of cars on line. Of course, this is important, but a very small factor when compared with the time a car is standing still."

A committee was appointed to look into the question of quickest handling of system and foreign cars, and report to General Manager Fitzgerald. E. H. Bankard, purchasing agent, and D. A. Williams, general storekeeper, talked on railroad material and supplies, distribution and best method of handling requisitions.

J. B. Dickson, chief engineer of maintenance of way, spoke on track conditions, which he reported very good, though high water had damaged the roadbed considerably and thus increased expenses. E. Stimson, engineer of maintenance of way, Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern, spoke along similar lines.

Richard L. Enman, private secretary to General Manager Fitzgerald, made a stenographic report of the proceedings. Mr. George L. Potter, third vice president, could not be present, but was represented by J. W. Coon, his chief clerk. F. W. Busse, chief clerk, represented J. E. Muhlfele, general superintendent of motive power. E. V Baugh, superintendent of dining cars, was present in the interest of his department.

The officials were quartered at the Deer Park Hotel and well taken care of by W. E. Burwell, manager. Circuit Chief Adams, with a corps of operators, promptly handled the large volume of telegraph business that originated during the day.

Among the ladies here were Mrs. J.E. Greiner, the Misses Greiner, Mrs. J. W. Coon, Mrs. C. W. Galloway, Miss Galloway and Mrs. D. A. Williams.

SPRING BEAUTIES.

By Margaret Richards.

Copyright, 1907, by P. C. Eastment.

"Uncle John!"

No answer.

"Uncle John!"

"Um—hm." He did not put down his paper, but you knew he was listening.

"Do you s'pose any 'spring beauties' have blossomed yet, Uncle John?"

Slowly he lifted his eyes and turned his head to the window. A ray of warm spring sunshine slanted across the bare branches of the old elm; already the lawn was tinted here and there with green. You waited expectantly, your hand on Guy's great black head.

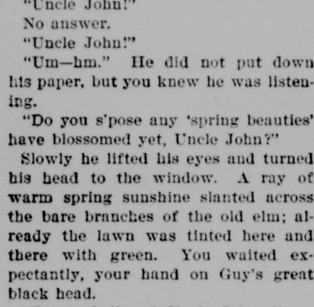
"Too early," and Uncle John disappeared again behind the folds of his paper. At no time was Uncle John's conversation likely to be adorned with any unnecessary words.

You sighed and stood looking out of the window, a wistful, disappointed little girl; looking while the huge Newfoundland dog beside you pushed his cold nose against your hand and licked your fingers with his great, rough tongue; looking while the budding maple bough beckoned and the million tiny little voices of spring called to you and a lovely little path bordered with sweet flower faces unfolded itself inviting'y before your mind's eye.

You coul. stand it no longer. With a happy little cry you ran out of doors and raced with Guy along the path. Breathless and rosy you halted to unlatch the gate. Out of the corner of your eye you saw the front door open, but you pretended not to notice, not even when Uncle John's warning voice floated to you down the pathway:

"You'll get your feet wet!"

On you went, the spring echoes in your ears, the spring sunshine in your eyes, to find your way suddenly blocked by a figure in front. Wonderingly you took your eyes from the glory of a newly leaved maple to see why the figure so obstinately stood in one place.



"HELLO, LITTLE DAME!"

A familiar face laughed down at you.

"Oh, Cousin Grace!" you cried delightedly.

Cousin Grace did not stay with Uncle John and Aunt Martha as you did. She lived with her father and mother in a house quite at the other end of the town. Nor was she a little girl like you, but a beautiful young lady, with bright sunshiny hair and wonderful blue eyes, and when she smiled—the sleeping beauty, you thought, and Cinderella and the beautiful princess in the tower must all have looked like Cousin Grace.

"Where are you going?" she asked, and you joyfully explained. If she would come with you she, too, might pick "spring beauties," you suggested. And, although she laughingly shook her head over the flowers, she, too, must have heard the spring voices, for she turned and followed you along a path that wandered away from the road through clumps of young maples and silver birches.

"This is fine!" you cried, racing Guy to an alder bush, then scampering back again. A memory of past frolics enveloped you. "If only Mr. Ned were here," you mused regretfully.

Cousin Grace said nothing, but the pretty smile faded suddenly from her lips. You regarded her in astonishment. Could it be possible that she did not want him too? Why, she and you and Mr. Ned had always had the greatest fun. Silently reproachful, you raised your eyes to her face, and two tears rolled slowly down your cheeks.

"I wish you wouldn't look at me like that," she said almost sharply.

"But it is your fault. Aunt Martha said so. She said she guessed you were sorry enough, now Mr. Ned has gone to New York, that you flirted so—so—so (you drew a long breath)—so outrageously," you finished, with conscious pride.

"Nonsense!" said Cousin Grace, and you saw that her eyes were very bright and her cheeks seemed uncommonly pink. "Nonsense, Aunt Martha should remember"—

She never finished, for with a short bark Guy made for the little stream, his tail waving frantically as he disappeared behind the rows of alders skirting the bank. One look, and with a glad cry you followed him, skipping from stone to stone in short skirted freedom.

On a rock in the middle of the stream, tall, broad shouldered, his clothing wet, his heavy boots streaked with mud, stood Mr. Ned, his pipe in his mouth, peacefully fishing.

"Hello, little dame! How do, Guy, old boy!" he called gayly, and then he dropped his line and landing net abruptly and, cap in hand, leaped quickly across the stepping stones and held out his hand to Cousin Grace. He had run up from New York for a couple of days' trout fishing, he said, and was so glad to see his old friends, and then they sat on the rocks and talked of such tiresome things as game laws and trout fishing and the greenness of the willows, while you broke off alder twigs and threw them in the stream for Guy to catch.

Suddenly Cousin Grace looked straight up into Mr. Ned's eyes.

"I hear you are very happy in New York."

"Yes," said Mr. Ned.

"Cherchez la femme?" she questioned.

"I see you have found me out," said Mr. Ned.

"Then there is somebody?"

"Yes."

"And you really are to be married?"

"In the fall," replied Mr. Ned promptly.

"Ned"—Cousin Grace put out her hand wistfully, her lips trembling—"I hope you will be happy."

"Thank you, I expect to be," said Mr. Ned. "We shall have a cottage in a pretty suburban town; nothing very elaborate, just a comfortable, homey little place with porches and a little ground. And we shall not be extravagant in the furnishing—just our books and pictures, a couple of good rugs and a few pieces of old mahogany," he ended, smiling dreamily upstream.

"It is late"—Cousin Grace spoke coldly—"and if we are to find 'spring beauties' we must go on." She rose as she spoke and gave him her hand.

So you went on, although the brightness of the spring day had departed—went on and left Mr. Ned throwing out his line and whistling cheerfully.

And then you came to the little path that had unfolded itself before your mind's eye, a path that pushed through the alders and willows and stretched over tiny threads of water that wandered away from the little stream.

It was there that you found them, clusters of "spring beauties," raising their delicate flower faces from the muddy ground. You dropped on your knees beside them. You laid your face softly against them, going from cluster to cluster in an ecstasy of delight. Not until you had plucked a handful of the frail stalks did you remember Cousin Grace.

"I've found them! I've found them!" you shouted. Still kneeling, you turned and looked back along the path, then you rose slowly to your feet.

In the middle of the path stood Cousin Grace and Mr. Ned. She had been crying, for her eyes were still wet, but she looked beautiful now and was smiling as Mr. Ned held her hands and looked down at her.

"You would not listen to me. I had to resort to desperate measures," he said, "and anyhow I wasn't so far out of the way, for I am going to be married in the fall, am I not, sweetheart? You know there has never been—can never be—any one but you," he added as his arms closed about her.

Your eyes grew big with wonder and delight. You did not understand how it had happened. You did not care. It was like a lovely fairy tale. Cousin Grace was the beautiful princess, and the prince had but claimed his own. Wide eyed and happy, you confronted them, while the pale "spring beauties" slipped from your fingers and lay upon the ground unheeded, a silvery, fragrant offering at love's shrine.

Honor the Old Time School.

Never speak or write of old time schools in derision. We are in advance of them in many ways, it is true, and for that we are thankful, but our thankfulness should be largely mixed with humility. Those were the schools of our fathers and grandfathers, and really it must be admitted that they were and are as a body entitled to our respect. They did their best in the light of that tallow candle. Are we doing as well in the brilliant blaze shed upon our path by electricity? They were slow in reaching an objective point in their ancient lumbering vehicles. Do we accomplish as much when we reach our journey's end by the limited? These are questions which the youth and middle aged of our day should ponder.—Western School Journal.

Weighing as a Game of Chance.

No one can live long in Bombay without observing the freedom from restraint that is evident among the users of scales and weights. Scales of all sorts may be seen, some with wooden beams, evidently homemade, others of recognized pattern, on which are used chunks of stone and odd pieces of iron by way of weights. Silversmiths, according to the Indian Textile Journal, still use the red seed of the acacia or the wild licorice for weighing the precious metals, oblivious of the fact that the weight of seeds is not constant and that they may readily be exchanged for others of less or more weight.

"She Isn't Me."

A woman was waiting for her sister in a railway station when a gentleman, looking for his wife and misled by a general resemblance in figure and clothing, stepped up behind her and, laying his hand on her shoulder, exclaimed, "Thank goodness, Emma, it's you!" The name he used happened to be really hers, which made the sudden familiarity even more startling. She jumped nervously. "You're mistaken, sir!" she gasped. "I'm Emma, but she isn't me."—Youth's Companion.

BOWSER GETS MERRY

Tries a New Drink With Friend and Comes Home in Jolly Mood.

MRS. B. GROWS WRATHY.

Old Philosopher Talks In Zig Zag Fashion In Trying to Explain the Cause of His Unusual Behavior. Finally Falls Asleep on the Floor.

[Copyright, 1907, by Homer Sprague.]

Six o'clock had come the other evening and no Mr. Bowser. It is not once a week that he is a minute over his time, and Mrs. Bowser began to wonder. When fifteen minutes more had passed, she began to get anxious. At half past 6 even the family cat began to get restive, and the cook came upstairs to say:

"I heard a boom, boom awhile ago, ma'am. Do you think it could have been Mr. Bowser blowing up on a street car?"

She was told to keep the dinner warm, and Mrs. Bowser sat down on the front steps to watch and wait. If Mr. Bowser was going to be late he should have telephoned. He carried an identification ticket, and if he had met with any accident she ought to have been notified before that hour. He had been throwing out mysterious hints of late as to the profits on keeping a thousand goats and making cheese, but he would hardly go to look over a flock after 6 o'clock. He had had something to say about balloons, but it did not seem reasonable that he would select the evening for making an ascension. When 7 o'clock had arrived the cook came up again to say:

"I know what's happened, ma'am, the same as if I had been there with both eyes wide open."

Cook Was Wise.

"He has probably been detained on business. Some one came into the office just as he was ready to leave for home," said Mrs. Bowser.

"It's weeping I am over his sad fate, ma'am. He was invited by some one to take a ride in one o' them things called an auto. He jumped in. After a bit he wanted to do the steering himself. He took the wheel, and before they had gone a block that auto was trying to climb up the walls of a fourteen story building. I can shut my eyes and see it as plain as day. The reason they haven't sent you word is because he was smashed all to a jelly and they can't tell whether he's a bag o' meal or a man. I knew it would come, ma'am. I've been telling you all along it would come."

Mrs. Bowser feared the worst, but wouldn't admit it, and as a reward Mr. Bowser hove in sight at 8 o'clock. He came along down from the car with an important air, and he waved his hand to her while yet half a block away. He was not only in good spirits, but he was a bit hilarious. This was further shown when he turned in at the gate. One of the ornaments of the front yard is a stone dog. He walk up to the dog and turned it on its back and slapped his leg in laughter.

"Mr. Bowser, what does this mean?" she demanded as he came up the steps.

"Come in 'er house, and I'll tell you all about it," he said as he passed in.

It was a cold, deadly fact that he was "sprung." His looks, his gait, his actions all showed it. It was the first time since he had joined the Gay Old Boys' club, months before.

"How dare you, sir—how dare you come home in this condition?" she asked as she followed him in and stood before him as he sat down in a rocking chair.

"Hole on, Mrsh. Bowsher—hole on a minit," he replied. "You speak 'bout my condishun. Does it sheem to you as if I had taken a glass too much?"

"A barrel too much, Mr. Bowser. You are certainly intoxicated. Think of a man of your age and standing coming home in this condition!"

"All wrong, Mrsh. Bowsher—all wrong. No condishun here. I am as shober as a judge on 'er bench. Sit down and let me tell you all about it. Thas right—sit down. Never like to shee a lady stand up on a street car. Always willin' to give up my sheet to her."

"Very well. Now, go ahead, sir, and explain matters."

Begins to Explain.

"It was zhis way, Mrsh. Bowsher. I was lockin' up office door to come home when Brown came along. You know Brown—man with cock eye and red hair. Brown's good feller—good feller. He borrows money of me and don't pay it back, but he's a good feller for all zhat."

"Never mind about Brown."

"I have to, 'cause he's good feller, you know. Well, Brown says the governor is over to the Gay house and wants to see me—wants to see Samuel Bowsher—wants to meet great man. Nothing wrong about that, eh? All 'er great men in 'er country like to meet me, don't they?"

"Go on," said Mrs. Bowser.

"I didn't want to go. I'd rather come home and meet you. I knew you'd worry if I didn't come home at shix o'clock. Brown's a good feller, and the governor's good feller, but you are better feller. Shake hands, Mrsh. Bowsher."

"Never you mind about shaking hands. Did you go to see the governor?"

"Yesh. Had to do it. Brown said it would hurt his feelings if I didn't do it. Yesh, went to shee 'er governor. You can't think how glad he was. Shaid he'd been wanting to shee me for 400 years. Shook hands. Patted me on the back. Almost kissed me. Mighty good feller—mighty good feller."

"Well?"

"Well, we shat down. Mebbe I shat on governor's knee—fhaybe he shat on mine. We talked. Never talked sho much in my life. He told me funny stories, and I told him 'er same. Shay, but you orter heard us laughin'. Never laughed so much in a hundred years. Governor laughed just 'er shame."

"And was he also intoxicated?" asked Mrs. Bowser.

"Intox'cated? Whazzer mean? Nobody was intox'cated. It was just hilarity. Do you think 'er governor of zhis great state would get intox'cated? Do you think Samuel Bowsher, your husband, would get intox'cated? Shake hands wiz me, Mrsh. Bowsher, and tell me you don't think so."

"But you had something to drink?"

"Course we had. Can't go to shee 'er governor and not have something to drink. After we first shook hands I asked him what he'd take. He shaid a glass of buttermilk wiz a cinder in it, and I said I'd take 'er shame."

"What do you mean by a cinder?"

"Dunno. Zhat's what 'er boys call it. Makes you laugh. If your mother was dead and you drank glass of buttermilk wiz cinder in it, you'd laugh and kick up your heels. Thas all we had, Mrsh. Bowsher—buttermilk and cinders. Shake hands and tell me zhat you love me."

"Never! Mr. Bowser, you have disgraced us. Even the cat is ashamed of you."

"Don't talk zhat way, Mrsh. Bowsher—don't do it. Can't 'er feller go and shee 'er governor without disgracing his wife and cat? Course he can. Shay, you just orter heard my speech. Governor wouldn't let me off wizout one. Shaid he was just dyin' to hear old Cicero. Zhat's what he called me—old Cicero. I am a shy man, Mrsh. Bowsher, but after awhile I stood up like zhis and held out my arm like zhis, and"—

And Mr. Bowser sat down on the floor and winked and blinked in an owly way as Mrs. Bowser looked at him. After a couple of minutes he went on:

Offers His Hand.

"I stood up like zhis and made 'er speech. You orter heard zhat speech. It lasted an hour. It made 'er governor laugh, and it made him cry. It will all be in 'er papers in 'er morning, and I want to cut it out and paste it in a scrapbook. You could hear 'er governor laugh all over town, and when he cried the tears just rolled down his cheeks in streams. You ain't mad, are you? You feel proud of your husband, don't you? Mrsh. Bowsher, shake hands and tell me zhat you are proud of your husband."

Mrs. Bowser sat stiffly and hadn't a word to say.

"Zhen 'er gov'nor made a speech," resumed the man on the floor in a sleepy voice. "Yesh, he made speech, but nozzings like my speech. No laughin', no weepin'—just common speech 'bout 'er Panamaw canal. Zhen we kissed each other, and I came home to tell you all 'bout it—a-l-l 'bout it. Mrsh. Bowsher, shake hands and—and shake hands and"—

And Mr. Bowser gradually stretched himself out on the floor and was lost in slumber.

"Has he perished, ma'am?" asked the cook in a whisper as she came upstairs.

"We will lock up the house and turn out the gas and go to bed," was the reply.

And ten minutes later Mr. Bowser and "'er gov'nor" and the cat and the whippoorwills and the summer breezes were left alone in the darkness.

Americans Are Governed by Convention.

By Princess TROUBETZKOY (Amelie Rives), Novelist.

WE Americans are fearless, but are we fearless enough? Aren't we afraid of SOMETHING after all?

Are we not afraid of ourselves, of each other? How few of us dare to live out our primitive instincts, to test the TRUE IDEALS of life. It seems to me that to find the supreme laws, the big statutes of the moral code—that is to say, the spiritual order of our lives—we must test the VALIDITY OF CONVENTIONS. As a matter of fact we are actually afraid of being without them, we cling to them like life belts in the big sea of experience, instead of striking out and learning to swim FOR OURSELVES, to make our bodies work for the spirit.

These supreme laws are courage, faith in the great spirit that can do no evil, endurance to suffer, realizing that the light of the spirit is discovered only when it is most needed, IN DARKNESS. It is very sad that we must suffer so much to arrive at spiritual knowledge, but it does not last. We must not evade any shadow of experience, even the vague panic of the senses, for when we are confronted with awe of something we do not understand it leaves us in a RICHER STATE OF KNOWLEDGE.

Sincerity is one of the principles of poetry. It is one of the great laws that OVERSHADOW THE CONVENTIONS. We have tenderness in our poetry, national pride, abstract philosophy, but we seem to be afraid of saying boldly, of seeing vividly, of defying the primitive instinct to disgrace the supreme spiritual purpose of our being.

Temptation is excused sometimes on the ground of heredity, whereas it is an INITIAL INGREDIENT of human nature. As a friend of mine said, expressing this idea of conventional hindrances to actual experience, "We all want a smattering of knowledge, we are all peeping on the sly at this, that and the other, trying to get a view of the REAL INWARDNESS of things, and after all perhaps it is better to look through these peepholes and see what we can than to see nothing at all."

The poet sees more than others, but there is a great deal in the MOTIVE that is behind the seeing. People regard God as a great, intangible power, as children look into a great deep well, with the awe of child wonder and mystery. They read in the Bible, "God is a consuming fire," and they SHRINK IN FEAR.

TO ME THAT IS A MAGNIFICENT SPIRITUAL SYMBOL. IT IS THE WARMTH AND LIGHT AND LOVE AND PITY OF EVERY HUMAN SPIRIT.

The Season's Crop Outlook.

By JAMES WILSON, Secretary of Agriculture.

SEEDING has been a little backward on account of the cold weather, but there is plenty of time between now and the last of September to grow a crop of ALL KINDS of grain. In Minnesota and the Dakotas, where we raise most of our spring wheat, seeding was delayed about two weeks.

While the weather has been unseasonably cold in some grain regions, still it has not been severe enough to retard plowing, and my advices are that the ground in those states was nearly all made ready to receive the seed in good time. We will have warm weather, and I don't see what is to prevent a NORMAL CROP of spring wheat in the United States.

As regards the Canadian northwest, the reports that this year's harvest may be SERIOUSLY DIMINISHED may have some foundation. According to what I regard as authentic advices from that region, the weather has been so cold that plowing has been almost impossible.

THE CANADIAN FARMER HAS USUALLY LEFT HIS PLOWING FOR THE SPRING, AND THIS YEAR HE FINDS HIMSELF IN A BAD PREDICAMENT.

However, such a condition in the Canadian northwest will not make a great deal of difference when this year's crop is HARVESTED. The Canadian farmer grows but a small portion of the total crop of wheat, and I am of the opinion that the deficiency, if there should be any in that part of the country this year, WILL HARDLY BE NOTICED when the harvesting throughout the world has been completed.

New York to Become a Desert.

By EDWARD H. HALL, Secretary of the Association For the Protection of the Adirondacks.

NEW YORK STATE FINALLY WILL BECOME AS BARREN AS THE DESERT OF SAHARA UNLESS SOMETHING IS DONE TO PUT AN END TO THE SPOLIATION OF THE FORESTS AND STREAMS.

Today her forests are practically limited to the Adirondacks and Catskill mountains. Climatic conditions have changed noticeably where this denudation has taken place. Streams have dried up entirely or become SPASMODIC and UNRELIABLE for industrial purposes. These conditions are now beginning to arise in the region tributary to the Adirondacks, and if a halt is not made and vigorous efforts put forth to retrieve the indiscretions of the past New York state will become AS BARREN AS THE DESERT OF SAHARA, her farms will be ruined, her mountains will be naked of trees and soil, her rivers will disappear as rivers and become mere troughs for carrying off the rainfall of each passing shower.

It is therefore the present duty of the people of New York to do three things: First, to protect INVIOLATE every acre and tree that we now have in the forest preserve; second, to extend as rapidly as possible the area of this preserve, and third, to REPLANT as rapidly as possible the denuded areas.

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.
FRANK E. RATHBUN, ASSOCIATE.

THURSDAY, JUNE 27, 1907.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

With this issue of THE REPUBLICAN Mr. Franklin E. Rathbun, recent vice principal of the Oakland High School, becomes the associate editor, which position, we have every reason to believe, he will acceptably fill to the mutual satisfaction of the patrons and management of the paper. Having had considerable experience in newspaper work heretofore and being otherwise equipped for the work we confidently believe that Mr. Rathbun will keep up the high standard all ready established by THE REPUBLICAN.

For seventeen years the writer has been sole editor and manager of the paper, besides having to look after other departments of the plant, and now he believes that he has earned a well deserved vacation, which he will take during the coming summer.

DISCORDS IN DEMOCRATIC HARMONY.

Since the death of Senator Gorman there has not been a recognized leader of the Democratic party in the State; Mr. I. Freeman Rasin received the toga for a short time, but death soon called him from the leadership. The result is that there is no one who is looked to by the Democrats as unquestionably the true leader. There are several prominent Democrats who want the honor of being at the head of their party, and so there is a fight going on as to who it shall be.

Young Mr. Gorman, the State Senator, is exceedingly ambitions to be at the top, and so he and Congressman Frank Talbott have formed an alliance. With Governor Warfield left out of the alliance, it is very week; for now the Governor comes forward with a strong force, with all of his admirers throughout the State back of him, rank and file of the party, and orders that the Gorman-Talbott forces take notice of him and his friends. The answer has been that the alliance defies the Governor's power, and so a mimic warfare is on between the self appointed leaders of the Democratic party.

Ex-Governor Jackson had a talk with Governor Warfield this week over the contretempts, with the result that the daily press is filled with rumors and suppositions that there will soon be a Warfield-Jackson combination to wrest the power from the other alliance. The victory is to the strongest, and with the victory will come soon a governorship and a senatorship. However, the Republican party is taking notice, is husbanding its strength, is united for success and is thrilled with the determination that victory will come to them this fall if the strength of the Democrats is weakened by internal dissentions and jealousies of those in high places.

ARE CHURCH AND STATE SEPERATE

It is often said that the man who comes with a new idea or a new view of an old one is hailed with as much renown as the inventor who comes forth with some device which greatly lessens labor. One of these men with a new idea comes from New England. He puts a new phase upon the church question. He states that the church and state should be seperate. So does everyone else who believes in the principles of our republic. But this writer from New England contends that the church and state are in fact not seperate in our government. That writer points out that churches are exempt from taxation, and that those citizens, those tax payers who are not members of any church, support the institution when they pay for its protection, for its rights in the courts, and for all the benefits which come to an institution located within the United States. The writer from New England contends that the churches should pay taxes, in order to pay for what it gets from the government; as it is now, the costs of its protection are paid by everyone, both church members and non-church members, and this is claimed to be wrong, inconsistent, especially when it is claimed that the church and state are seperate. The idea is reproduced here only for the purpose that some may become acquainted with it and thus line up upon one side or another in the discussions of the subject which are likely to follow in years to come.

METHOD OF NOMINATION YET UNDECIDED.

The Legislature at its last session passed a law creating in Baltimore city the Crawford system of party nominations, which puts in the hands of the people direct the power to nominate men for the various public positions. Recently, however, Attorney General Bryan gave it as his opinion that the law applied with equal force to all parts of the State. However, up to this time, nothing definite has been decided in the matter.

In Cecil county, however, a test case is being made of the issue, and it will be before the Court of Appeals of the State this month. When its decision has been made, then it will be known if it is legal to conduct party nominations in the old way. The outcome of the case is being watched with great interest by the people throughout the State, for should the Court decide that the Crawford system of nomination should prevail, then Garrett County this fall would have to depart from the customary method of electing delegates to nominate the county officials. If the Crawford system is declared to be the legal form of nomination, then a regular election will be held early in the fall by each party to determine who the nominees for the various county and State offices shall be.

The Central Committee of Garrett county of the Republican party will make no decision until the Court renders its decision in the matter. Should the decision be delayed, the committee will leave it to the party to decide which system shall be adopted.

There are many prominent leaders in the political affairs of the State as well as many of the rank and file of both parties who favor the adoption of the Crawford system, for it is argued that the nominating power is placed where it properly belongs, that is in the hands of the men who are to elect the officials and who are called upon to support the ticket.

Do You Love This Old Town?

If you do, of course you want to see the town grow. You want to see the storekeepers prosper, and the banks bulge with deposits, and the townspeople wearing glad clothes, and the farmers falling over each other to come in and buy new hay rakes and patent plows. Of course you do. Because, likewise of course, when things are that way you get your share of the general prosperity.

But what are you doing to contribute to the general prosperity? Are you patronizing home industries in preference to outside industries? Do you buy your clothes and groceries and garden tools and so forth here at home?

Well, you admit, you do send away for a good many things you happen to see advertised. Aha! And are they advertised in this paper? No, indeed—in the mail order journals and catalogues. Quite true. And you would just as soon buy them here if they were advertised by the local merchants, wouldn't you? Why, yes.

Well, now, there's a neat hint to some of our local storekeepers and dealers who perhaps haven't discovered why they are losing a lot of home trade which they ought to keep.

It's a wise business man that knows his own opportunities.

GEORGE MARVILLE KILLED.

Thrown from Buggy Against a Tree, Having His Skull Fractured.

George Marville, a resident of Deer Park, was thrown from a buggy and killed last Friday afternoon. The accident occurred near Uplands, the summer home of Mr. George W. Haulenbeek. The remains of Mr. Marville were interred Sunday morning in the Deer Park cemetery, after short services had been condncted at the home of the deceased. While driving from Oakland Marville's horse became frightened and ran away, throwing the occupant out against a tree, fracturing his skull. His death was immediate.

Mr. Marville was thirty-eight years of age and unmarried. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. C. W. Hudson. The post mortem examination showed that death had been caused by a fracture of the skull. He is survived by a mother, a brother and a sister.

NEW GERMANY.

We are having fine weather at present and the farmers' faces are all smiles.

We imagine the resurrection prophets are feeling a little foolish over their disappointment.

Miss Sarah Durst is working for F. L. Otto.

A lawn fete was held at Fairview, Saturday night and several of our young folks were in attendance.

During the severe electrical storm on last Saturday evening, a barn belonging to James Ross was struck by lightning completely destroying the building and its contents. Two horses and a buggy however were saved. The building was insured.

Ross Durst and sister Dora, were in Accident last week.

We understand that E. S. Brenneman is to be teacher of our school this win ter.

Clarence Glotfelty made a trip to Grantsville last Saturday to purchase a new buggy.

Mrs. Mahalia Durst, who has been very ill, is somewhat better.

Salem Lee, of Swanton, passed through New Germany last week.

New Principal Fairmont Normal.

Charles J. C. Bennet, A. B., Ph. D., now professor of Philosophy and Psychology at Louisiana State University, but formerly of West Virginia, has been elected principal of the Fairmont State Normal. U. S. Fleming resigned as principal of that institution a few weeks ago.

MR. JAMES E. M'GETTIEGAN

President of Board Supervisors at a Meeting Held Last Saturday.

At a meeting of the Board of Election Supervisors held last Saturday, Mr. James E. McGettigan, of Accident, was elected president. The election of Mr. McGettigan was strongly urged by the rank and file of the Democratic party, and shows the high esteem in which the new president is held by the members of his party. The former president of the board, Mr. Thomas Little, resigned, owing to his work being in West Virginia. The board of supervisors is now composed of President McGettigan, Peter A. Chisholm, the newly appointed member, and E. E. Sollars. While it is out of the ordinary for the president of the board to live anywhere except in Oakland, yet it is conceded that in this instance the board has made an exception which meets with the approval of the party.

COURT HOUSE BEGUN.

Contractor Liller has a Large Force of Men Making Excavations for the New Building.

For several days, Contractor W. A. Liller, of Keyser, has had a force of men at work upon the site for the new court house. The dirt which is being removed for the foundation will be used in making a terrace in front of the buildint. It is the purpose of the contractor to have the building completed as rapidly as possible.

At a recent meeting of the building committee, Capt. J. M. Jarboe was elected superintendent of construction, it being his duty to see that all of the requirements of the contract are carried out.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

An ice cream festival will be held at the residence of Mrs. J. A. Hayden, Mt. Lake Park, Tuesday evening, July 2, at 8 o'clock, under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid Society of the M. E. church. Proceeds for the repair of the church.

The weather for the past week has been almost perfect and the summer visitors already on the grounds are delighted with the Park.

Among the late arrivals we note the family of Dr. Baldwin, the family of Mr. Harry Clayton, the family of John L. Ruhl, Mrs. Stone and Mrs. Jones, of Wheeling, and Mrs. Thorn and daughter.

The Student Conference has not been largely attended, although the program is one of the best ever presented to our people. It will continue over Sunday, and its sessions should be attended by everybody in the neighborhood.

Boating on the lake is being enjoyed by our young people.

The bowling alley is open and is well patronized.

Mr. Robert M. Douthat, of Morgantown, W. Va., is here attending the Student Conference.

There will be no preaching service in the M. E. church Sunday night and our people are urged to go to the Hall of Philosophy and hear Dr. Sweet's closing address.

Union Depot for a Day.

Under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid Society of the Methodist Church, of Oakland, and under the management of Miss Myrtle Mae Critchfield, of the King's School of Oratory, of Pittsburg, there will be given by local talent a play next Friday evening at the Opera House. The title of the play is, "Union Depot for a Day," and is said to be filled with unusually strong features which seem to promise that it will be a great hit. Forty young people are in the caste, and each of them is working as hard as possible to make it a success. Everyone of them seem to be interested in the play, and this goes to confirm the rumor that any one who cares to have a laugh and spend a few hours away from the serious half of yourself, will feel fully satisfied if he or she goes to the Opera House next Friday evening to see and hear the play entitled, "Union Depot for a Day." Popular prices will be charged for admission.

The cast is as follows:

Lightning Pranks at Will Smith's.

Sunday evening at about nine o'clock, the telephone lines running into Mr. Will Smith's store at Hoyes, was struck by lightning with the result that the building was set on fire. Mr. Smith happened to come into the store in time to catch the fire before it spread very much. The fire caught the building near the telephone switch.

At a recent meeting of the Oakland Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, at Thomas, W. Va., during the week just passed, Messrs. C. G. Stator were examined and recommended to the annual conference which meets at Huntington in September, for trial.

The daily press has been filled with continued rumors of the engagement of Judge Louis E. McComas, formerly United States Senator from Maryland to Mrs. Upton Muir, of Washington. Friends of the Judge say that the wedding will take place about July 15th, and that they will sail for Enrope about the 16th. The Judge recently purchased a home in Washington, of which he will take possession next fall. The wedding is expected to be extremely simple and to take place in New York.

Mr. and Mrs Thos. J. Peddicord of Oakland, were in the city from Saturday eveniug until Sunday afternoon, the guests of Rev. and Mrs. J. A. McClelland, at the Presbyterian manse. They were to have remained in the city until today, but Mr. Peddicord was advised by telegram to go at once to Baltimore to appear in an important case before the courts there. Mr. Peddidord is one of best known attorneys in Maryland and practices also in the higher courts of Ohio, Kentucky and other states.—Grafton Republican.

Dwight Miller, son of Hon. Thos. C. Miller, sustained a painful injury during the ball game at Morgantown Thursday afternoon. About ten years ago he suffered a severe twist of the knee which gave him trouble for some time. The hurt of Thursday was somewhat similar to that of ten years ago and is quite painful. It may prove more serious than now supposed.—Fairmont West Virginian. Dwight Miller has been spending the summer for several years at the Park and is well known to the summer people there.

Mr. James F. Grimes, of Deer Park, has taken full possession of his recent purchase of the Williams property, and his family are occupants of the cottage and premises for the summer. Mr. Grimes is one of Pittsburg's leading real estate dealers. The borough of Knoxville, a close relation of the City of Pittsburg, was founded by Mr. Grimes and it is in a prosperous condition. Mr. Grimes is a strong advocate of the building of the Confluence and Oakland R. R. to Oakland, and if Garrett county can secure a few more settlers of his type, it will be brought about.

Mr. "Cal" Browning, of Deer Park, is in Baltimore city undergoing treatment for an affection of the eyes at the Eye, Ear and Throat Hospital on West Franklin street. He was in the hospital since about the middle of May and although Dr. Theobald, a noted eye physician of Baltimore, has been giving him attention, Mr. Browning does not feel as though much progress is being made towards the restoration of his eyesight, though the physicians and the nurses, who are very attentive, give him some encouragement. Garrett county friends who have happened in Baltimore have called to see him, and he has enjoyed their visits. He longs for sufficient improvement to enable him to get back home, for he says there is no place like Garrett county after all.

Major and Mrs. J. M. Burns accompanied by their daughter, Miss Evelyn, and their sons, James and Edward, passed through this city yesterday, en route to Mt. Lake Park, where they will spend the remainder of the heated season. Corwin Burns, who is a member of the National Guards, will join his parents at the Park, after the encampment is concluded. Major Burns owns a pretty cottage at Mt. Lake Park and together with his family spends each summer at this popular mountain resort.—Fairmont West Virginian. Major Burns, at his own request, has been retired from further duties at the West Virginia University, at Morgantown, where he has been employed for several years as an instructor to the cadets of that institution.

As the years go by, there can be readily noted a great improvement in the teaching corps of this county. Those who attended the examinations held last Thursday and Friday at Oakland and Accident, remarked about the improvement which is being made among the teachers of our county. While everything desired has not yet been attained, yet there are many advances. A large number of teachers are coming from the adjoining counties, Allegany, possibly, furnishing the greatest number. Many of the graduates of the accredited high schools of Lonaconing and Westernport come to this county to teach. However, at the recent examinations, those students of the Normals were able to make equally as good showing as those from schools outside this county.

Former Oakland Girl Married.

Miss Nora Cecelia Sarsfield was married Tuesday at Piedmont to Mr. Arthur Leo Brew, of Washington, D. C. The ceremony took place in the Catholic Church at Piedmont in the presence of a large number of invited guests. The bride was a former resident of Oakland, and is well known to many here. Miss Bertie Wolf, of Oakland, was bridesmaid.

THE DEATH RECORD.

RUSSELL NAY RUMER.

Russell Nay, son of Mr. and Mrs. Noah Rumer, was born July 19th, 1903, and died near Crellin, June 20th, 1907, at the age of four years, eleven months, and one day. He was laid to rest in the Ashby cemetery on June 21st, 1907.

MRS. MARY THAYER.

At her home near Thayersville, on Monday evening, Mrs. Mary Thayer, widow of Wright Thayer, died from the effect of paralysis. She was buried yesterday morning in the Thayersville cemetery, and the funeral services were conducted by Rev. Donachy, the Baptise minister, of Friendsville. She was in her seventy-fifth year, and is survived by three children, John, William and Daniel, two other sons, Thomas and Harry, having died some time ago.

NELLIE G. KILDOW.

Miss Nellie G. Kildow died at the home of her foster-parents, Mr. and Mrs. George C. Kildow, near Oakland, Monday morning, at 12:05 o'clock. She died of consumption, with which disease she had suffered for several years. Her age was fifteen years, ten months, and seventeen days. The funeral services were held yesterday afternoon from her home near the Totten farm. They were conducted by Rev. J. B. Workman, the pastor of the Methodist church of which the deceased was a member. Her remains were laid at rest in the Oakland cemetery. Miss Kildow has lived at Oakland for seven years, and during that time has become well known to our people. And in the same time she made many friends who sympathize with those of her own household who will feel most keenly the absence of her Christisn, cheerful spirit.

MRS. AGNES HART NELSON.

Mrs. Agnes Hart Nelson died at her home Tuesday evening at 8.55. The immediate cause of her death was dropsy. Her age was twenty-nine years and sixteen days. She was interred this morning at nine o'clock in the Oakland Catholic Cemetery.

Two children, a husband, two brothers and three sisters survive her. The older child's name is Mary, aged four years, and the younger's name is Marcellus, age two years. The brothers are Messrs. John W. Hart, of Oakland, and Eugene Hart, now of Pittsburg, Pa.; the sisters are Mrs. Joe Helbig and Miss Mary Hart, of Oakland, and Mrs. C. A. Bolden, of Myersdale, Pa.

The deceased has been sick over a year, but was not compelled to stay in bed all the while except during the six weeks preceeding her death. Her home was in the Mrs. Townshend property on Alder street, from which place the body was taken this morning to the Catholic Church where the usual service of the Catholic church were conducted by Father Connell, of which church she was a devout member.

She was married to Mr. Thomas Nelson, of Oakland, on April 30th, 1902. She was born in Oakland, June 8th, 1878, and having lived in this town all of her life she is well known to the people of this vicinity.

Mrs. Nelson was a woman of unusual attractiveness. She was a mother who said her first duty was to her home and her own. Throughout her entire life she displayed those characteristics which made her acquaintences to be her friends. All who knew her admired her bravery and praised the beautiful spirit which she displayed on all occasions during the last year of her life, when she realized that soon she was to be called to the next world.

The quiet fidelity with which a woman will dishwash her life away for her husband and children is a marvel of endurance. Here is the servitude of woman heaviest, no sooner is her work done than it requires to be done again. Men take jobs, work on them, finish them and they are over for good and all. The prospect of ending them and drawing pay for labor is alluring, but no such allurements are held out for the wife. She washes Monday after Monday the same garments until there is nothing more of them to wash; then they are replaced by others of new material just like them, and the rubbing and winging goes on forever. She mends the stockings with tireless fidelity, the same holes meeting her gaze week after week, for if there is a "darned" place in a sock "he" invariably puts his irrepressible toe through it. Every morning the rooms are put in order, only to be in the wildest disorder by the time night falls. There are no jobs, each one different, no terms, no pay. The same socks, the same washing, the same room every time.

I will mail you free, to prove merit, samples of my Dr. Shoop's Restorative and my Book on either Dyspepsia, The Heart or The Kidneys. Troubles of the Stomach, Heart or Kidneys, are merely Simptoms of a deeper aliment. Don't make the commen error of treating the symptoms only. Symptom treatment is treating the result of your ailment, and not the cause. Weak Stomach nerves—the inside nerves—mean Stomach weakness, always. And the Heart, and Kidneys as well, have their controlling or inside nervs. Weaken these nerves, and you inevitably have weak vital organs. Here is where Dr. Shoop's Restorative has its fame. No other remedy even claims to treat the "inside nerves." Also for bloating, biliousness, bad breath or complexion, use Dr. Shoop's Restorative. Write me to-day for sample and free Book. Dr. Shoop, Racine, Wis. The Restorative is sold by all dealers.

SCHOOL TEACHERS MARRY.

Miss May Hamill and Prof. H. A. Loraditch take the Marriage Vows.

Miss May Hamill and Prof. H. A. Loraditch were quietly married Monday morning at six o'clock at the Catholic Rectory by Father James E. Connell. The ceremony was preformed in the presence of a few friends and relatives of the bride, among whom were Mr. Roy Hamill, a brother, and Mr. M. R. Hamill, the father of the bride; Russell Browning, of Blaine; Dr. and Mrs. Frank Laughlin, of the Park. Immediately after the marriage, the bride and groom took No. 2 for the east, where they will visit the Jamestown exposition In the party that went with them was Prof. Morris K. Turner. At Cumberland they will be joined by School Commissioner Ellithorpe, who will accompany them to the exposition.

The bride for a number of years has been employed as teacher in the public schools of Oakland, and the groom has had charge of the manual training department for several years in the same school. Both of them are followed in their honeymoon trip by the best wishes for a happy life from many Oakland friends. The bride is the daughter of Mr. M. R. Hamill, the assistant cashier in the First National Bsnk of this town.

Marriage Licenses.

Since June 17th, Clerk of Court Tower has issued marriage licenses as follows.

The Palmer Letters.

In this issue will be found a continuation of the series of letters which are being sent to The Republican by Mr. U. G. Palmer, who is so well known to people of Garrett county, and who is now making a trip throughout the west. They are well named, "Pencilings by the Way," and are filled with information which is of great interest to the people of this section. They are written in a racy style, and apparently touch only the mountain tops of the picturesque western land of ours.

Got a Good Berth.

Albert Lohm, formerly of Deer Park and at present a prominent young lawyer of Clarksburg, has been appointed private secretary to Hon. W. P. Hubbad, Congressman from the First district of West Virginia Mr. Lohm's many friends will be glad to hear of the new honor which has been conferred upon him and will hope that he will meet with continued success in his new position.

Strawberry Season Short.

The local strwberry season is going to be conspicuous this year by its briefness. Local produce men announced that next week will see the height of the season, season, and that in about another week the season would be over The cold, rainy weather has grown the berry, but prevented its ripening, and now these few warm days are turning out the berries in great quantites.

As a rule the local berry season lasts for several weeks, but this year weather conditions make it possible to number it by days.

Engineer Killed.

Mr. Edward A. Young, an engineer on the Western Maryland Railroad, was killed Saturday, near Shaw. He was leaning out of the cab window, when he became overbalanced, falling out, striking an embankment. He was thrown back under the train and cut to pieces. His home was in Cumberlann.

Sunday School Rally.

A Sunday School Workers Conference will be held in St. Paul's M. E. Church on Monday at 3 p. m. at which it is desired that all teachers and officers of the various Sunday Schools of Oakland and vicinity be present. At 4 p. m. there will be a children's meeting and at 8 p. m. a platform meeting will be held at which time the county organization will be effected. Dr. Charles Roads, D. D., General Secretary of the Maryland S. S. Association will have charge of the meeting.

THE TWO GREAT LEADERS OF THE CIVIL WAR

The Great Struggle Was a Contest Between Peers.

STALWARTS IN THOSE DAYS

Davis Was Secretary Under Pierce and Had Distinguished Himself in the Mexican—Lincoln Had Also Been a Soldier.

Rev. Charles Edward Locke, pastor of Hanson Place Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., who delivered the baccalaureate sermon at the Womans College, Baltimore, Sunday last, in an address on Memorial Day in Brooklyn to an audience of 10,000 people, said:

"The Civil War was the most vehement and bloody of the years, because its issue was to settle forever the policy and performance of the most favored land upon which sun could ever shine! Our forefathers were stalwarts. They had developed the strength of struggle. They had battled against angry seas to reach these shores; they had subdued wild beasts and impenetrable forests, on a hundred battlefields they had fought the initial struggles for freedom against a foreigh foe. They were warriors bold, and when they found themselves arrayed against each other on fundamental principles of government they discovered in each other foemen worthy of their steel. It was a war not for conquest, but for conscience; knight against knight, schoolmate against mate, Christian against Christian, freeman against freeman, each fighting as he prayed, and all, in the hush of battle, singing the same songs and bowing at kindred altars. Men were listening for a heavenly voice and looking for a heavenly vision, and they heard it in the thunders of war and read it on the clouds of battle!

"Yes, it was a contest of peers. An interpretation of the constitution became necessary. Under the porcelian skies of the South that masterful document seemed one thing, while on the vigorous altitudes of the North it appeared to be something entirely different. The issue could not be settled forever until it was determined by equals. Many of the best generals on both sides were products of West Point. The same adjectives which are used in describing the valor and integrity and personal qualities of Grant and Sheridan and Sherman can be most justly employed in referring to Lee and Stonewall Jackson and Albert Sidney Johnson. Two men were born within a few months of each other, a few miles apart, in the same State—one in poverty, the other in prosperity. One was educated in the best schools of his State, and afterward appointed by President Monroe to West Point; the other received his education out of a few borrowed books which he studied at night by the light of pine knots. They were both tall, serious men; both orator of unusual power; both men of prayer; both patriots of conviction and courage; and each was pressed forward by destiny into the representative places of trust of opposing constituencies. The one was Abraham Lincoln, the other Jefferson Davis.

"Jefferson Davis was married to a daughter of Zachary Taylor, the twelfth President of the United State. He was Secretary of War in President Pierce's Cabinet. He was a United States Senator from Mississippi. When his State withdrew from the Union he arose in his place in the Senate chamber, and, in announcing his withdrawal from that body courtesyly begged the pardon of any whom he had offended in debate. Lincoln and Davis were men of the same type. With unswerving devotion each stood as a gladiator by his interpretation of eight and justice. Lincoln completely embodied all the traditions and virtues and hopes of a liberty-loving people—Lincoln, the unapproachable patriot, the apothesis of American manhood. The God nations waited through dragging decades for the development of these combatants of corresponding conscience and ability, and when in the arena of the American continent they met in hand-to-hand encounter, it was, indeed, the greatest combat of history."

BRYAN'S VIEW OF A DEMOCRAT

Western Leader Defines Him As a Jeffersonian Citizen.

Accepting your kind invitation to define a Democrat, I beg to say that the subject may be considered from two standpoints: First, from a party standpoint, a Democrat map be defined as one who is a member of the organization known as the Democratic party. . . . I would say that a Democrat is one who considers himself a member of the Democratic organization, who works with the Democratic organization and who expects to vote the Democratic ticket. . . . I do not mean to say that by taking part in the organization he would bind himself morally or politically to indorse any platform that might be adopted or support any candidate who might be selected, for these questions must be left to the conscience of each voter; but when I say that he expects to support the ticket, I mean that he desired to do so and will do so unless good and sufficient reasons can be given for refusal. . . . A Democrat, if the meaning of the name is considered, must be one who believes in the right of the people to rule and in the capacity of the people for self-government naturally accepts the fundamental Democratic doctrine of local selfgovernment—that is; that the people can govern best where they best under stand conditions. The Democrat believes that the individual should be left to choose his own course except where his action would injuriously affect others; that each community should attend to its own matters; that the State should have control of State affairs, and that the Federal Government should be supreme in its sphere.

There are those who are constantly and consistently democratic, in spots; there are those who apply democratic principles to all questions, and there are those who apply democratic principles to some questions. It ought to be the purpose of these who engage in educational work to enlarge the number of questions to when democratic principles are applied. . . .

To recapitulate, a Democrat, according to a party definition, is a man who connects himself with the Democratic party and acts politically with those who bear the same party name. In a broader sense, he is a Democrat who believes the rule of the people and who desires to make the Government the instrument in the hands of the people to carry out their will. Such a man trusts the people and favors such reforms as will give to the people an increasing power. And a real Democrat will not only favor Democratic methods in government and insist upon the right of the majority to rule, but will favor the administration of the Government in the interest of the whole people according to the Jeffersonian maxim—"Equal rights to all and special privilege to none."

A SCHEME TO PREVENT FLOODS

Gigantic Task Which Pittsburg Chamber of Commerce is Agitating.

PITTSBURG, Pa., June 18.—Under the direction of the Pittsburg Chamber of Commence on agitation is being made in an effort to have the city, state and national government take up the gigantic task of relieving Western Pennsylvania, especially this city, of the annual inundations from the rivers in this vicinity.

The great flood of March, this year, has aroused lively interest in the project. The plan of the Chamber of Commerce is to plant trees on the waterbeds at the head waters and rearing immense forests, which will appropriate large quantities of moisture and prevent sudden thaws of vast extents of snow Millions of dollars will be required to carry out the work and a campaign will be inaugurated to arouse interest snd secure the necessary funds. Unofficially it is announced by specialists on rivers that at least 2,000,000 trees will have to be planted. The scheme entails an appalling amount of labor, and even then will not accomplish any material good, according to the experts, for at least 15 years. The combined basins of the Monongahela and Allegany Rivers comprehend a territory of nearly 20,000 square miles in Western Pennsylvanina, West Virginia, Western New York and Maryland.

Shortly after the first of each year Pittsburg is visited by a flood that menaces lives and does great monetary damage. Several smaller floods are also experienced. The great flood of last March came with alarming suddenness. Over a score of persons lost their either directly, to the raging water, and a property loss of between $15,000 000 to $20,000,000 was sustained.

Nearly 100,000 working people were temporarily thrown out of employment by the high water flooding the mills, factories and manufacturing establishments of Pittsburg. Street car lines about the city were crippled, train schedules were annuled, electric light plants were ruined and the city streets and buildings were in darkness for several days. It was with great difficulty that newspapers could publish. All these facts are now being taken into consideration by the Chamber of Commerce and the residents of Western Pennsylvania. They have been assured that could the hills and mountain sides be once more rehabilitated with their natural sheltering garment of trees and bushes, that the floods would be completely checked. if indeed, they did not wholly disappear.

During the last session of Congress $25,000 was appropriated to make the initial experiment under the auspices of James Wilson, of the Department of Agricnlture, who has commissioned William L. Hall, in charge of the Appalachian Mountain Forest Rererve, to come here for the purpose of investigating the matter and report on the feastibility of the experiment.

Membeas of the Chamber of Commerce are enthusiastic over the idea, and propose to hold numerous meetings and agitate the matter until steps are finally taken by the city and state to meet the expense attendant on the proposed restoration.

Not a One-Sided Matter.

Baltimore newspapers are this legislative-electing year unusually sore over alleged advantages the counties enjoy from city-tax incomes.

They argue upon premises that imply that the city is pretty nearly the whole thing.

But the facts are that without the counties Baltimore would make a poor show as a town, much less a city.

Without the continuous flow of county production to swell Baltimore-city profits and promote Baltimore-city growth, there would not be a divergent cent to quarrel over.

All that Baltimore has been, is, or will be, has, is and will be due to its predominance over the counties as a trading mart.

With the city's thousands of drummers on the road in the countries, each is a missionary for contributions to city trade and city business.

Otherwise, there would be no drummers.

Now tell us how many drummers the counties have in Baltimore seeking Baltimore custom?

If there be any, state how much city patronage of any kind they are getting for county goods?

Not a cent's worth.

All the counties have in coal, wheat, etc., goes to Baltimore by the law of railroad gravitation, and in the exchange which follows Baltimore prices rule on both sides!

Hence, as a mere trader and handler of produce and goods Baltimore makes two profits out of the county people who do the producing.

Let it be admitted, than, that in only one respect it happens—that a comparatively small one, Baltimore gets the lighter end of the bargain, it is not too small a business for a big, boastful city to kick because it does not get the big end in all the distributions?

But the newspapers are in earnest about gobbling the only little advantage the counties have—that little mainly devoted to the promotion of popular education.

They want more city representation in the Legislative, and urge that stronger men be sent to the Legislature, in effect, to compel a re-adjustment of absolutely the only inequality of governmental profit that exists to the detriment of the city.

In the interest of the Baltimore wealth the counties' educational dividend, one of the very few tangible blessings State government confers outside the cities—this dividend is a fraction that must be "reduced to it lowest terms."

We say—in the interest of Baltimore wealth, because that element wants more money for popular education without contributing more for it.

To meet the pretensions set up for this grab in the name of the equality the Journal hopes the counties will send representatives able, strong and brave; men who cannot be bamboozled out of the only little interest their constituent own in the firm of the city and State.—Frostburg Journal.

Patriotic Remnants.

THE evening of the Fourth has came,
But where is Willie's ear?
The one that's left looks quite the same,
But where is Willie's ear?
This morning when he went to play
With cannon crackers all the day
His lugs were twain. Now where, I pray,
Is Willie's other ear?

Upon the Fourth the sun has set,
But where is Albert's nose?
We've all our little darlings yet,
But where is Albert's nose?
When to the fray he went at morn
With matches, punk and powder horn
He'd all the things with which we're born—
Now where is Albert's nose?

The gloaming's started in to gloam,
But where is Charlie's leg?
The rest of Charles has all came home,
But where is Charlie's leg?
